Every Wednesday and Saturday

"Joker" is the name of the brand new brand on that Universal program. Beginning Oct. 25th there will be two "Joker" comedies every week—Wednesday and Saturday. On Saturday it takes the place of the old split "Imp." On Wednesday it takes the place of the "Powers" release which will be moved up to Monday. Every "Joker" will bring pride to the hearts of Universal exhibitors as sure as fate!

that Universal Program

Beginning October 25th, 1913

"Joker" comedies, we predict, will establish themselves with the public in less time than it has ever taken for a new brand to get a solid foothold. We are 'way ahead of release dates on negatives and every one of them is a real scream. "Joker" comedies will come in full and split reels and will contain the kind of nonsense that everybody enjoys. We promised you such a film and now we're making good!

"Bleeding Hearts"

Or "Jewish Freedom Under King Casimir of Poland" is one of the really great features of years. This 3-reel masterpiece will be released October 2nd. Make plans immediately to get it from the nearest exchange.

WARREN KERRIGAN

Some Booking Suggestions

This two reel feature production, together with a cold copy comedy, will make a very attractive show. The cold copies we have in mind are entitled "COOKING FOR TROUBLE" and "THE HUNCHBACK," a special feature attraction in one reel adapted from the Arabian Nights. This suggested combination makes a show for the feature exchange that excels anything the regular exchange can offer. Live-wire exhibitors are gradually placing themselves as the circuits of feature exchanges. This combination is good on any circuit or as a special business-getting attraction.

The Story

The story concerns two old persons who have raised their son's child, because his wife was of the child-hating kind. After caring for the child for ten years, the mother comes to take it away. The child is reluctant to go, having grown attached to her grandparents. Numerous complications ensue, and it is finally determined which is thicker, blood or water, when the grandfather saves the child from the hands of a gang of crooks who had planned to teach the little girl the art of picking pockets.

EIGHT REASONS

In all the confusion of arguments for this service or that service, there are two big facts that stand out pre-eminently. First, General Film offers eight multiple feature releases everyweek. Second, those features have greater merit than any pictures that you can book.

"The Conscience Fund"

Selig. Two Reels. Released Oct. 6.

"The Man in the Street" operates against his own father, a trust magnate, who has consistently cheated the Government. The detective and his sister, a nun, finally make complete restitution without ruining their father's name. Clear-cut action following a thread of breathless interest.

"Two Mothers"

Patheplay. Two Reels. Released Oct. 9.

A baby is sent to an asylum when her father is killed and her mother's reason is lost. A wealthy widow adopts her and rears her. Then her own mother, cured in mind, finds the baby, now grown to girlhood. The choice between her two mothers is the problem, solved when the girl prevails upon both mothers to live with her. Gripping, human, powerful.

"The Flower of Destiny"

Kleine-Cines. 2 Reels. Released Oct. 7.

Jealousy impelled Count Ferdinand to kill the page who loved the Countess, but the murdered boy's sister, determined to avenge his death, made the Count love her and then, disguised as a boy, won the affection of the Countess, too. The rattling climax comes when she makes use of the power she holds over husband and wife.

"Dear Old Girl"

Essanay. Two Reels. Released Oct. 10.

The story of a college student whose mind is unhinged by the death of his fiancee on the day of their wedding. Every day he goes over the events that came just before he learned of the railroad accident that ruined his life, until one day his unbalanced condition leads him to his own death. Intense, human interest in a most picturesque setting.

EVERY WEEK

Don't cloud the situation with irrelevant ideas. Realize that there are eight multiple reel reasons every week why you should have General Film in your house. Here are the eight reasons why General Film houses will be packed from Oct. 6 to Oct. 11.

"The Riddle of the Soldier"

Kalem. Two Reels. Released Oct. 8.

The engrossing magazine stories of "Madelyn Mack, Detective," by Hugh C. Weir, have been picturized with wonderful effect. Alice Joyce plays a woman sleuth for the first time in her career, when she calls the police to nab the kidnappers; the fight that follows is crammed full of action—the last word in realism.

"In the Shadow of the Mountains"

Edison. Two Reels. Released Oct. 10.

How an Eastern man, broken in business, makes good in the West. The new start leads him to a partnership with a sturdy old mountaineer whose daughter has all that the mercenary girl back home lacked. A story of pluck and nerve and courage, winning against overwhelming odds.

"Breed of the North"

Lubin. Two Reels. Released Oct. 9.

Set upon the trail of a supposed murderer, an officer of the Northwest Police finds he is trailing his own twin brother. They exchange places; the wrong man is held until the guilty half-breed confesses. A remarkable tale of double identity, full of the mystery and charm of the great woods.

"The Test"

Vitagraph. Two Reels. Released Oct. 11.

England and Africa provide the scenes for this stirring army story of two men and their love for the wife of one of them. It takes a call to the fever camp to bring out the real stamina of the two men. The husband proves himself worthy, and wins back the love that was wavering.

"The Last Minute"

Release Tuesday, October 14, 1913

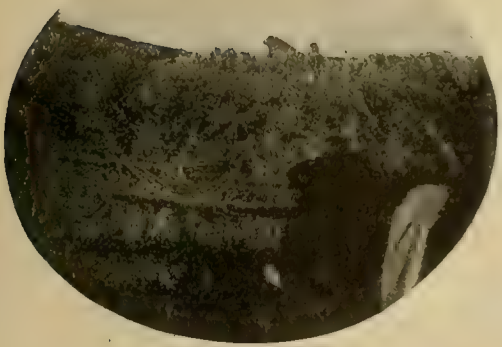
ANOTHER of the "Arizona Bill" series, featuring Joe Hamman at his best. Charged with action, full of thrills and following a pretty story through situations of splendid dramatic power, you will find this a fitting successor to the "Mong Fu Tong" for adventure and excitement.

Before dying, John O'Connor, an old friend of "Arizona Bill," writes to him, asking his presence at once. Arizona proceeds in haste to his friend's home and is handed a will designating as heiress Miss May Hobson and Arizona Bill as executor. Sullivan, the disinherited nephew of O'Connor, promptly contests the will, and a month of thirty days is allowed Arizona to prove the authenticity of the will.



There follow thirty days of wild excitement, during which May Hobson is captured by a gang hired by Sullivan, and Arizona has a warm time to save his neck. Bill's wife also takes a hand in the tussle and shows Arizona the track of the bandits.

To see Arizona's wild ride on horseback, to see him follow the bandits as they leap upon a passing train, by himself leaping from his galloping horse to the vestibule, to see him wage the fight over the top of the coaches, into the engine room, on the very roof of the engine; and, finally, to see him make a spectacular leap from the locomotive into the bed of a river, is to realize what thrills this two-reel affords.

Better book it—and remember the date is Tuesday, October 14. Released through General Film Co.

A dramatic tale full of exciting incidents that command the attention from start to finish. Ruined in Wall Street and rejected by his betrothed, Foster starts west for the gold regions of the Rockies. He saves an old man from a tough gang in a saloon, and in return is taken into his mining venture. Claim jumpers attack them, but are driven off after a hard fight. They haven't money enough to work the mine, which proves very rich, and Foster goes east to raise funds. His former friends laugh at his story and he is forced to use "get-rich-quick" ads to accomplish his purpose. Fosdick, an old rival both in business and in love, has Foster arrested on a charge of using the U. S. Mail to defraud, but the old man appears on the scene with some nuggets taken from the mine, and Foster is released. Yes, there is a love story, too.

Facts and Comments

ON what theory is it possible to justify the filming and exhibiting of recent events in the life of a man who escaped from an asylum where he had been confined by the order of a court? The persons filming these scandals and the persons placing them on the screen of their theaters are not pursued by actual want and the plea of poverty which is often urged for the commission of offences against good taste and the laws of decency is therefore unavailing. It is most significant that these scandal films are exhibited on certain vaudeville circuits "exclusively." The vaudeville managers have never entertained any very amiable feelings toward the motion picture, regarding it as a necessary evil rather than a legitimate attraction. Do these men want to create a disgust for moving pictures by giving a practical demonstration of how wickedly this great invention can be abused and degraded? One is driven to a guess of this sort in searching for a motive. It does seem to us that such exhibitions are revolting to every decent human being. To film and show such events is the equivalent of coining filth and capitalizing scandal and crime.

It is incredibly amusing that the filmers and exhibitors of such disgusting things are now quarrelling among themselves as to which is the genuine "horror." Is it possible that these poor deluded individuals cannot see what a sorrowful spectacle they are making of themselves in the eyes of all people of normal views and instincts? It is childish and insincere to say the public want this sort of thing. Of the six millions of people living about the mouth of the Hudson but a hundred or two make a habit of visiting the places which are used for the deposit of refuse and garbage. The rest of the six millions hold their noses when they are forced to pass anywhere near the malodorous and unsightly piles. If there is any difference between the physical and the moral garbage it is imperceptible to the eyes of ordinary mortals.

THE habit of many good and well-intentioned people and especially of ministers to denounce things generally is most deplorable. Here comes the Reverend C. W. Bridwell, who devotes a whole page in a religious weekly to wholesale condemnation of motion pictures. In vain we read and re-read the reverend man's article to find at least some trace of the facts upon which he bases his angry philippica. There are plenty of phrases such as "Sin holds high carnival and the devil reaps a great harvest." The preacher saw automobiles in front of some of the moving picture theaters. From this fact he draws the distressing conclusion that in these automobiles "maidens ride with dissolute characters. Not infrequently a sweet-faced country girl is sent garlanded to her doom. She is with companions whose empty laughter and dissipated faces betray their vocation."

With all due respect to the reverend gentleman's calling we must tell him that this modern world of ours is tired of rhetoric and the coining of empty phrases, whether in books or in pulpits. What we want are plain facts stated in a plain fashion. The clergyman says that the "church is unable to cope with this evil." We are happy to say that the great majority of clergymen no longer look upon the motion picture as a foe of the church. On the contrary, they recognize and utilize the picture as a most valuable ally in all educational and religious work. Mr. Bridwell speaks of the preaching of Paul, intimating that he would be a relentless enemy of motion pictures. We believe that Paul, were he living today, would give a good deal of his time and attention to the starting of a great moving picture plant devoted to the production of excellent religious pictures. As a means of religious propaganda the motion picture will play a tremendous part in the near future in spite of all the Bridwells and their kind.

TWO bills of importance to the moving picture industry will be introduced at the coming session of the legislature of New York State. One measure will deal with the poster evil. The proposed law will make it a misdemeanor to exhibit any posters portraying crime, prison horrors, gunplays and other scenes offensive to common decency. The other bill is intended to make impossible the recurrence of scandal films and films showing contemporaneous crime or scandal. If this second bill is enacted into a law any person filming or exhibiting, for instance, the escape of a lunatic from a prison or the violation of "white slave" laws will be liable to punishment for a misdemeanor. The bills will have the united support of all the civic societies of the State and will be vigorously pushed in both houses of the legislature.

Too Deep

By Louis Reeves Harrison

MILLIONS go to see moving pictures; millions are more or less affected by them; millions probably form some offhand and instinctive judgment of what is shown. Very little expression is given to opinion other than "I like it," or "I don't like it," and the why and wherefore does not greatly concern those who find an enormous amount of easy money coming their way. Why should they bother? Why attempt to have standards of taste in this, as in other arts? Though Ruskin long ago proclaimed what we are just beginning to fully realize—that all arts are teachers,—why attempt to improve this one to a point where it could command universal respect? Why try to better anything, especially ourselves?

The founder of The Moving Picture World was a man of well-balanced mind. He neither dragged along in the mire of sordid commercialism nor was he inflated with a lot of impossible ideals. He believed that no man could create what was too good for his fellow-man. He also believed that a producing business of any kind must be made to pay in order that its best purposes be carried out. I believed from the outset that the best pictures were none too good for the people and that the interests of all concerned in their production and exhibition would be best conserved by constant improvement in quality. In such close accord, we grappled with the problem of establishing standards of taste.

The New Art was without tradition. None of us could go back to masters of other days and learn the rules of what had never been. Neither producers nor men of the press had other guide than that of getting at the forces behind the art and the consideration of what it was accomplishing. No man could look deeply into the subject without realizing that moving pictures were bound to become a power in working upon the human spirit, and no man of heart would desire that influence to be an evil one, but there was temptation for those who believe in getting money, regardless of how they get it, within the law, and they tried it. Such men are often large advertisers—damaged goods require more exploiting than those of unqualified value,—and there were times when standing out for a principle was hazardous. One man stood, and there every clean-minded man in this country stands today.

There is not the slightest doubt that the drift is all towards the production of superior pictures, but an element that has always operated against what is best still exists and is still proclaiming that the people want in this product what few of them ask for in any other. Sensational posters may serve to draw the curious into a theater, but it is high quality that brings them back again. There is not the slightest objection to a spirited or exciting drama that contains something worth while, but a lot of plays otherwise worthless are now being marketed on employment of mechanical accessories alone or strung out over a series of movements, military or melodramatic, that mean nothing to the spectator when they are seen.

I am unalterably opposed to fakes in this business on common sense grounds. They only appeal to a limited number of people of limited intelligence, and they keep away from the exhibitions a vast number of people who would become steady patrons of what was genuinely meritorious. Even pictures that are weak or faulty operate against the success of every person financially interested in the business, so there is a practical reason for critical selection and approval or disapproval of what is being done, however theoretical it may appear at a glance.

In setting up standards I have been accused of favoring what is new and spontaneous, but this is a slight misconstruction of what I have consistently advocated. It seems to me that a photodrama should deal with what affects people of today in preference to centering on a theme of former concern that is not of strong present interest. It may be that an ancient environment would be more effective than a modern one. There are social and political questions of the hour that have come up at other periods with dramatic results and that could be strongly enforced by showing what happened then. I simply advocate that some one of the hundreds of questions now agitating civilized people be considered rather than what is no longer of vital importance.

The use of old stories needs no champion. All literature is being industriously raked over for screen reproduction and not with an idea of "revealing unsuspected recesses of the human soul." We are in sore need of great features containing character delineation so veracious as to be instantly recognizable and enjoyed, portrayals of our common humanity in some individual type, instead of staring half-bored and half-amused at the sorry imitations of real creatures ordinarily exhibited on the screen. Suppose that human nature be presented as it is, as the best and brightest writers see it, as the cleverest actors can portray it, as people all over the country would enjoy it, the producer would be deluged with letters from a certain class of exchange men and exhibitors saying that the photodrama was "too deep."

That sounds funny, but it is true. Worse than that has happened. I am not at liberty just now to give names, but a photoplay producer now considered to be one of our half-dozen greatest recently told me that practically every success he had made had been condemned as "too deep" by the commercial members of his firm before it attained release. The audience experienced no trouble in grasping his subject—the shallowness was nearer home. The photodrama long used as a model by the Universal Company dealt with a problem in abnormal psychology, and I was present when a Fourteenth Street audience of shockheads gave it a storm of applause. A great feature that has stirred Broadway for months holds up the profound beauty of Christianity in contrast with the license of Paganism. There is marvelous depth to a dramatic creation of Maeterlinck's which more than fifty companies played at the same time in various parts of the world.

"Too deep!" There is usually a question of significance involved. There is a different meaning in the bark of a great Dane and that of a toy terrier. The depth of a play does not prevent its being made known to all—that is a question of exposition. Motives most shallow may be easily involved in obscurity. Deep plays are those we may expect from writers of large mental endowment, men who go to the bottom of human nature, who fathom great truths, who bring to light what has been buried in dark silences. Those are the very mysteries we would like to comprehend.

No man will create what is too good for his fellow-man. The best pictures are none too good for the people. The more earnest, the more penetrating, the more intense, the more heartfelt, the better, when really great dramas are to be considered. Let us go deep into the social problems that are deeply affecting us at this moment! Let us probe the ignominy of our political system! Let us search for the truth, even if it is as deep as a well! For "truth is truth to the end of reckoning."

Perfection in Titles

By W. Stephen Bush

THE perfect picture tells its story without any titles, but as there are very few perfect pictures good titling becomes a necessity. Good titles have made many a mediocre picture acceptable and have marred many a picture deserving of a better fate. We have made some progress in the matter of titling these last three or four years. Time was when the titles on foreign-made pictures looked like extracts from the latest edition of an Ollendorf grammar. Anyone possessing a dictionary and a crowbar felt himself entirely competent to translate from any foreign tongue into English. The grammar was bad, but the spelling was as a rule even worse. Nor were matters much better with our native films. It seemed as if it were against the principle of some producers to employ competent men in the preparation of titles.

While great progress has been made in the science of making and editing titles much remains to be done.

Some of our European producers still insist on translating the titles into "English" before they send the films here. English as it is understood and spoken in Germany, France and Italy is delightfully free from the shackles of grammar and usage, but it is at times somewhat hard to understand. Translations made in a foreign country are nearly always a fearful handicap to the spectator.

Nor is the practice of just translating the titles on this side to be encouraged. No matter how fine the translation it will not do full justice to the film. Translating from one language into another is often impossible and generally unsatisfying. It is like taking a tree, pulling it out of its native and congenial soil and transplanting it, roots and all, into strata of strange earth. The operation never leaves the tree in its old pleasing shape.

With a new audience come new needs. Fit your titles to the taste and the demands of your American audience. Some things in the foreign films which are laboredly explained in subtitles need no explanation to a quick-witted American spectator, while, on the other hand, certain peculiar customs and conceptions of European life, though quite intelligible to an European audience, need a word or two of comment and explanation to our public.

The best course to me has always seemed to discard and throw away the titles in the foreign languages and to ignore them absolutely. To provide proper titles you must do far more than merely translate words from one tongue into another. Look at the picture with the eyes of the average patron of the moving picture theater and seize upon the psychological moments when a title is required. The oftener you can look at a film for the purpose of finding good titles for it the better.

It is well to bear in mind that titles are a necessity and not a luxury. Be brief and condense. Condensation is a fine art. A trial will convince even the novice at the work that persistent efforts to condense and condense again bring good results. It may seem impossible to compress a certain title into less than fifteen words. Try and try again and you will presently find that twelve or even ten words will do the work which you were sure required twenty words. The mental processes of the spectator who follows the pictures with his eyes must constantly be kept in view by the conscientious titler. The shorter the title the quicker it will be absorbed. The main thing is always the picture. The easier the spectator can go back from title to picture the better is the work of the title-builder. It ought not to be the mission of the title to decorate and embellish the picture. Such a course means attempting the impossible. The decoration and embellishment must be done by the pictures and not by words. The idea that the titles may at times take the place of the pictures instead of merely supplementing them is a fruitful source of mistakes. Titles may show the lapse of time, but they should not ordinarily try to describe the moods of the actors or fill the events that are necessary to the action but are not shown on the screen. When titles indicate a long lapse of time the picture must not belie the title. It is alarming to see a title indicating that "twenty years have passed" and have the pictures show that the hero is still wearing the same suit while the heroine is wearing precisely the same coiffure as of old. Better omit the title altogether and show the lapse of time in the character of your picture. It is bad policy to have your title send the schooner to the fishing banks for a rich haul and then have it return with many loads of fish which are only mentioned in the title. Titles may and ought to help along the imaginative powers of the spectator, but the pictures must be the chief stimulators of the imagination. Give the spectator credit for average intelligence. If the picture shows a railroad track do not assure the spectator of that fact in the title.

A prominent manufacturer, speaking of titles, gave orders to his literary corps to make every reel "foolproof." "Make your titles as numerous," said he, "and as long as you think necessary for making the reel understood by even the lowest intelligence." This producer reminds me of the man who is running well but running in the wrong direction. The percentage of patrons who need diagrams in addition to pictures and titles is negligible. I have sat among audiences of all descriptions in various parts of this and of other countries and nothing is clearer and surer in my mind than the quick intelligence of most audiences. People get used to reading pictures. There is a grammar of pantomime which is easily learned by a little practice. It is all very well to play down and to title down to the lowest order of human intelligence when you are sure that this lowest grade is largely represented, but such an assumption is scarcely probable in this country of common schools and natural brightness. It used to be the fashion, many years ago, to shape the election laws for the special benefit of the dear illiterate voter, but this policy has gone out of vogue because the illiterate voter constitutes a ridiculously small percentage of the electorate. I think we can take our cue from the world of politics. It is no longer necessary to burden the screen with too much explanation just because every film must be warranted "fool-proof."

In features, titles are even more important than in the single reels. In the feature the title must spin out the thread of action which connects one reel with the other, making a complete and harmonious whole out of three or more separate and distinct parts. It has always seemed to me that in big features consisting of four or more reels each part ought to have a very short introduction and synopsis of its own. This keeps the interest from lagging and shows the relation of one part to another. It may be remarked incidentally that in titling a feature you generally test its merits. Every feature, especially one that deals with scenes of historic or educational interest, requires more generous titling in the first and second reel. When you find that the need of titles grows less and less as you approach the middle and the end of your story you may be reasonably sure that your feature has in it the promise of success.

"The Bridge of Shadows" Selig

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

I HAVE been very deeply impressed by a private view of "The Bridge of Shadows," a two-reel subject produced by Fred Huntly, of Selig's Western staff, the scenario being written by W. E. Wing. My impressions have been varied and at all times pleasing. The story is intensely human. The sunlight of good fortune shines at the close on good, innocent souls who have been forced into the dark shadows of misery and poverty, but not of shame, by a relentless fate. As the true gold in the characters of the principals is being tested and refined by the trying ordeals to which it is subjected, the spectator's mind is tense with sympathy and glowing interest. Moreover, the flow of the pictured story is smooth and direct, with no tortuous windings to disturb or distract. These pleasing results are attributable to a well constructed scenario and to painstaking and capable direction.

Scene from "The Bridge of Shadows" (Selig).

Still greater credit is due the actors in this photodrama of stirring heart interest. H. A. Lockwood and Miss Mabel Van Buren, new to me in photodramatic leads, will be remembered for their sterling characterizations of Edward Warren, the head bookkeeper of the bank, and Blanche Edmunds, daughter of the banker. The sweet girlish-womanliness of Blanche and the proud, though humiliated, manliness of Edward Warren force us to sympathize with them all the more in their struggle with misfortune. Our old friends, Al. Filson and Miss Lea Errol (Mrs. Filson), show finished character work in the parts of Judge and Mrs. Scanlon. William Brown also merits special mention for his fine and dignified impersonation of the banker, Francis Edmunds.

"The Bridge of Shadows" affords a strong object lesson on the dangers attending circumstantial evidence, when the life or liberty of the accused is at stake. It also throws a warning light for the guidance of judge or jury in such cases, even where the accused is set at liberty. The stigma on his or her name may be removed in the eyes of the public at large, by the discharge of the prisoner; but there may exist in the minds of the officers, who attempted to fasten the crime on the accused, a feeling of unbelief and the animus to drive him to crime by depriving him of the right to secure employment.

Edward Warren is the new head bookkeeper in the bank of Francis Edmunds. On the first day in his new position, the rumor spreads that the chief assets of the bank have been made almost worthless by ravaging floods in the country adjacent. Soon the rumor becomes so tangible that it is printed as news in the daily papers. Banker Edmunds, in great mental distress and suffering from heart disease, comes to his office and examines the securities affected. He calls Warren to the room and they examine the books. Shortly afterwards, feeling ill, he leaves a note for Warren, who has been called to another room on the premises, asking him to return to the private office late in the evening and attend to certain business. He encloses the key to the office in the envelope, and then goes home. There he dies, soon after his arrival, from heart shock.

Warren is handed the letter by a clerk, just before leaving for supper. He reads the note and throws it in the waste basket and puts the key in his pocket. When he returns, an hour later, he is observed by a detective, who follows him into the bank, thinking him a burglar. Summoning a policeman, the detective arrests Warren. Vainly does he protest that he is an employe of the bank. The note that would have established his standing had been thrown away, and, on calling up the banker's home for confirmation of his story, he learns that the banker is dead. The officers then take him to prison, where he is held for trial.

In the days immediately following the banker's death, his whole estate and his beautiful home are seized by creditors, and his only daughter, Blanche, is reduced to poverty. Shortly afterwards Warren is brought to trial and is pronounced innocent.

Blanche tries to serve in various capacities for a livelihood, but her inexperience leads to her discharge again and again. Warren succeeds in finding menial employment, but is discharged through the influence of the police. Reduced to despair, he is about to jump from a bridge one day and end it all, but is prevented by Blanche, who chances to pass at the time. Both are assisted by a band of gypsies, and in the end it turns out that the securities of the Edmunds bank are safe after all, and that Blanche is a wealthy heiress. Needless to state she and Warren share the good fortune that has come, in their newly wedded bliss.

The release date is Oct. 13.

PICTURE THEATER OWNER LEASES ENTIRE BUILDING.

Wm. M. Smith, manager and owner of the Cozy theater, a moving picture and vaudeville house situated at 4 East Third Street, Tulsa, Okla., has recently taken a ten year lease on the World Building in that city which he will remodel into a first class moving picture and vaudeville house. Mr. Smith figures that the remodeling of the structure will involve an expenditure of about $10,000. When completed the theater will be known as the Empress. The money Mr. Smith has made from the Cozy theater enables him to take the ten year lease on the World Building and to remodel it. The house will have a seating capacity of 1000. The balcony will seat 450 and on the parquette floor there will be 550 seats. The appointments of the new theater will be up-to-date in every respect. The admission prices will be ten cents the entire house in the afternoon and ten and twenty cents in the evening. Mr. Smith, who is only twenty-one years of age, is a very popular man in Tulsa and environs. Besides being a progressive theater promoter, Mr. Smith is treasurer of the Oklahoma branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

Charles Clary in Selig's "Toils of Deception," released September 16, shows how he attends to minor details. Leaving his office, intending to stop at a jewelry store, he lights a cigar. As he enters the store you see outlined against the window a half cigar. These are the little things that often get away, especially when consecutive scenes are photographed days apart.

"Arizona"

Six-Reel All Star Feature.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

IT is a pleasure to watch the initial showing of a photoplay that is bound to make others glad. "Arizona" will certainly afford delight to many millions in this country, whatever effect it has abroad, and I see no reason why truthful representation of conditions here should not be highly relished there. It is stamped with distinct character drawing, and realistic American environment is felt through the agency of an infinity of detail, but its appeal is universal. To face hardship and injustice with courage is not a question of nationality, but a large number of those who came to this country in its infancy were in rebellion against wrongs in older civilizations and endowed with that fortitude without which no great nation can be created. If this be the spirit of our people, love of progression and indifference to the errors and shams of tradition, it must be breathed into our national drama. There is one wholesome whiff of it after another in "Arizona."

Scene from "Arizona" (All Star).

After a long session of misrepresentation, in which what is given out as distinctively American would appear to be the brawling of a lot of cow punchers, a purely sectional phase of life with which few of us are familiar, "Arizona" comes like a cool breeze at a time of nauseous suffocation. The intense desire to right wrongs that runs red in the veins of our people and of our kind of people, in all parts of the earth, should make plays that are really and truly American, popular wherever they are shown to justice-loving audiences irrespective of nationality. Our national existence is one of action and ability to cope with hardship.

Scene from "Arizona" (All Star).

At a disadvantage from lack of knowledge of the original stage version of "Arizona," I may be wrong in expressing the opinion that the screen portrayal is more of a growth than an adaptation. There are expected signs of transformation from one form to another, especially in the complicated plot. Interest in a feature play, as in a novel, is apt to be attached very early to one central figure of absorbing importance, one to whom things happen, who overcomes difficulties by force of character, or who fails and falls in the struggle. Minor characters and side issues, offered in relief or to cover other movements on the stage, are distracting in the screen story. This distraction does occur, but we are held by fine characterization until the complete plot is gradually unfolded. Thereafter we are reading a novel, which, it seems to me, is very much as it should be in large screen presentations.

We are reading the story of a noble young officer, who stands up bravely under one after another form of disgrace and punishment to shield the honor and happiness of his superior officer's wife. This is not an exaggerated form of heroism among our army and navy officers. To the contrary, it is part of their code, and there is something distinctly national in this consideration for members of the gentler sex who are led into error through temporary weakness, manly recognition that they are special charges of ours, to be protected and helped over difficulty rather than condemned for loving not wisely but too well. One of the strong points of this production is the fine attitude of the male characters towards all members of the mother sex, barring, of course, the butterfly who sips at every flower.

High honors go to the cast, including the butterfly who gets badly stung at the end. I expected great things of Miss Gertrude Shipman after her marvelous screen impersonation of "Camille" in past work, and I was not disappointed. Miss Gail Kane was all I hoped she would be and much more. These two are a constant delight to the eye while they are on the scene. The strongest acting, however, was that of Miss Alma Bradley as "Lena." It was a highly-intelligent and sympathy-winning performance. Such an array of talent as that shown by the men held me from start to finish. Cyril Scott, William Conklin, Francis Carlisle, H. D. Blakemore, Robert Broderick, Charles Graham and C. E. Davenport. What a splendid lot to be grouped in one screen story! All the types were those of truth, not the caricatures of theatricalism. I suppose part credit for this goes to the author and to the director, but the interpretation was fully up to what was there to be interpreted.

"Arizona" is all right so far as present standards are concerned, but I have watched the growth of those standards and dare hope that we are not going to stop here. We can only take a few minutes for lunch, then go ahead. There are going to be much better plays written. Mr. Thomas may write some of these himself after the present program is exhausted. If he prefers to create first for stage presentation, he will have screen purposes better in mind and lose nothing thereby. This experience may open his eyes to new possibilities, to some of the greater achievements yet to come.

"No mortal yet has measured his full force. It is a river rising in the Infinite and emptying through the soul of man."

"A PRINCESS OF BAGDAD."

The Helen Gardner Studio has now ready for delivery "A Princess of Bagdad," an Oriental picture 8,500 feet in length, very handsomely costumed and staged, full advantage having been taken of the opportunity for elaboration afforded by its Oriental character. The photography is perfect and the success of the picture is assured, as it has already attracted much favorable criticism and there can be little doubt but what all territory will be sold at once.

The next picture taken will be that of "A Daughter of Pan," a fanciful story taken from ancient mythology and offering great opportunities for beautiful exterior effects, as it is a romance of the sylvan gods and goddesses disporting themselves in their favorite haunts in the most sequestered and beautiful nooks of the primeval forests. Miss Gardner will be seen in the role of Duse, a forest maid, the daughter of Pan, a part expressly written for her and suited to her talents.

NEW SOLAX LEADING WOMAN.

Claire Whitney, who recently joined the Solax Company, is the daughter of an Australian promoter and has had an enviable career for a young girl of twenty-two summers. She started on the road to histrionic fame when only fifteen. For two years she was on contract for Cohan and Harris and in that space of time traversed twice around the country playing one night stands in the "Opery" houses of one horse towns and villages as well as in the two dollar houses. She recently starred in a sketch called "The Little Blond Lady." She made her debut in pictures at the Biograph studio and has also been in stock with Pathe, and supported Florence Lawrence at the Rex Company.

"The Closed Door"

Florence Lawrence Returns to the Screen Invigorated by a Long Rest and in a Victor Picture Worth While.

By George Blaisdell.

FLORENCE LAWRENCE has come back. Not only has she come back, but stronger and better than when she deserted the screen. Her year's rest from work shows in the opening scenes. There are the old-time enthusiasm, the snap and the go which we now see have in the past placed Miss Lawrence in a class by herself. There's no one just like her. If you personally like your women sedate, dignified, you will fall in love with her near-tomboyish ways just the same. The long-time screen favorite is fortunate indeed in the story in the interpretation of which she makes her re-entrance to the hearts of picture followers. Captain Leslie T. Peacocke, of the Universal staff, is the author of "The Closed Door." He has written it with a knowledge of the capacity of Miss Lawrence for depicting varied emotions. It is a story that thrills at times and goes straight to the heart. Likewise is it a story for men and women. Children will not understand it, youth will not appreciate its depth. Throughout the two reels the picture holds. The first one interests and entertains, and at times amuses, but the second grips.

Scene from "The Closed Door" (Victor).

In the opening scenes we see again the Florence Lawrence of the early days. She is romping about the lawn with a bulldog, the one as light of foot and as agile in movement as the other. When she wants to get the effect of a certain dress material she commandeers one of the men servants and compels him to stand while she drapes it over his shoulders. When her sister's sweetheart is forced to remain at his desk on the night of a ball she goes to Neill, his employer, hatted and cigared, and before demanding the release of the young man imperiously insists on the removal of the hat from the head and the cigar from the mouth. She gains her point, quickly, and roguishly invites Neill to call on her. She also has gained his love. When Neill comes to Florence's father, who is in financial difficulties, and proposes marriage, the family furthers his suit. Florence believes he is moved by social ambition, that he is offering his money for her position in the community. She tells him for the sake of her father she will marry him, but she will be a wife in name only.

Florence keeps to her word. When the two go to Neill's home after the marriage ceremony the wife goes to her room, puts the key in the inside and locks the door. Her husband tries to win her through presents, but the jewels are thrown at his head when he attempts to embrace her. Neill tips his wife on the stock market, and her family is enriched as Neill is correspondingly impoverished. It is to be regretted that this action is not made more clear to the observer. Husband and wife go to a social affair. It is the wife who suggests a return home. The husband accompanies the wife to the Door. As it closes on her Florence's hand is extended. Neill kisses it. The face of the wife is a study as she shuts herself in.

The market goes against Neill. His wife is watching him keenly these days. When the husband comes home, puts a pistol in his pocket, sends a note to his wife that he is going away, and starts out, the ice melts rapidly. She gets the Key, puts it in the mouth of the bulldog and sends the animal on the trail of the husband. He is found sitting on a rock looking at the pistol. The dog drops the Key in the man's hand. The man returns home, tries the Key in the Door. It fits. He goes to his wife. She feigns sleep in an armchair. The husband coughs and the wife opens her eyes. Yes, it is the Key. The husband cannot realize he has won. He puts the Key on the arm of the chair and walks away. The wife jumps to her feet and after or rather at the retreating figure she hurls the Key. It strikes him between the shoulders. You may have one guess as to the finish.

Miss Lawrence is to be congratulated in her choice of leading man. Alexander Frank is a perfect foil. He has poise, dignity and absolute self-command. In temperament, if we may judge by his excellent work in this picture, he is the antithesis of Miss Lawrence—which augurs well for the pictures to follow. The supporting company is strong. Much care was given to the staging of "The Closed Door."

It is said the next picture will be even better. If all the coming releases measure up to the standard of the initial production, picture lovers may be content.

"THE LAST MINUTE" (Kleine-Eclipse).

Exhibitors will be pleased to hear of the early release of another two-reel Kleine-Eclipse feature in which that redoubtable character "Arizona Bill" plays the lead. "The Last Minute," as its name implies, is charged with action and adventure from start to finish. The release date is set for Tuesday, October 14.

In this story, "Arizona Bill" is given thirty days in which to prove the authenticity of a will against the disinherited nephew of an old friend. There are moments of stirring excitement in the repeated combats between the hired gang and Arizona and his wife. There is a scene in which Arizona leaps from his saddle into the vestibule of a passing train, wages the battle from the roofs of the coaches into the engine cab, over the roof of the cab among the whistles, steam gauges, etc., and finally, in full view of the camera makes a daring leap from the engine roof into a river. There is easily a fall of 60 feet in this desperate jump and it thrills the observer with its dare-deviltry. "The Last Minute" will delight those persons who found the swift-moving "Mong-Fu-Tong" a money-maker.

"David Copperfield"

Hepworth Tells Delightful Picture Story in Six Parts—Blinkhorn Has American Rights.

READERS of Dickens and particularly those who love the great author's favorite book "David Copperfield," will be entertained and edified in seeing the pictured version of that story recently produced by the Hepworth Company, of London, and now being marketed in America by Albert Blinkhorn. American companies have given us, in a small way, some excellent motion pictures dealing with the Life of David Copperfield, but these have been brief character studies in the main, not attempting to cover the entire story. The Hepworth picture is in six parts beginning with the childhood life of David at the Rookery, Blunderstone, and depicting the more important incidents up to the time of his marriage with Agnes, terminating with the Yuletide dinner.

Scene from "David Copperfield" (Hepworth).

It would be quite impossible to put into any single production all of the little comedies and tragedies included within the covers of this famous story. The wonder is that the Hepworth people have been so successful in separating the events in which David was most concerned and clothing them with so much interest. Rare discrimination has been exercised in the choice of events so that we have been given a story in pictures that holds together and does not tax the imagination of the observer or require a profound knowledge of the story itself in order to obtain the fullest enjoyment from the seeing of it.

Scene from "David Copperfield" (Hepworth).

Much of the beauty of this picture lies in the scenes of old England. Hepworth's have gone to the actual places of which the story tells and given us views of Canterbury, the cliffs of Dover, and street scenes that have not materially changed in the past hundred years. The beach at Yarmouth and the home of Peggotty and Ham and Little Emily, referred to so frequently and lovingly by David, is reproduced in a gratifying manner. The locale of this production throughout was carefully chosen and gives educational value to the picture.

A master hand is revealed in the selection of the players who made up the cast of "David Copperfield." The types are true and the work of the players is sympathetic. The part of David is portrayed in childhood by Master Eric Desmond, a remarkable child actor. So great is the sympathy he awakens that his disappearance at the end of the second reel is regretted. But the David of Mr. Lon Bethel, at the home of Mr. Wickfield, is a pleasing youth who bears a strong resemblance to the sturdy, curly headed little fellow of earlier days. The third period of David's life is taken by Mr. Kenneth Ware, a well found young gentleman of good address.

Wilkins Micawber was fairly reincarnated for this production by Mr. H. Collins. That grandiloquent old optimist could scarcely have been better portrayed. Uriah Heep, by Mr. J. Hulcup, was all the oily, insinuating villain that we have conceived him to be, and Mr. Tom Butt's impersonation of Mr. Murdstone could scarcely have been more stony hearted and indifferent. Beauty, grace and ability are shown by both Miss Alma Taylor as Dora and Miss Ella Fineberg as Agnes. In fact, every member of the cast seemed to come right out of the book, so well did they fit into our conception of the characters.

Bits of comedy occur now and then to enliven the scenes, and there is something of a thrill in the wreck scene where Steerforth loses his life and Ham is killed in a brave attempt to save him.

Hepworth has set a high standard in this production and has fairly disproved the oft repeated charge that the British producer could not make a good motion picture. "David Copperfield" will live long on the screen and, though it may not create a sensation in amusement circles or crowd theaters, it will have many admirers and will increase in favor with audiences of the higher class. It will also have a certain educational value that will make it most desirable for school use, for few schools these days do not include a critical study of this famous story of Dickens' in the course of English literature.

Considered from a purely mechanical point of view it would be difficult to find a flaw in the entire six reels. The photography is excellent and the settings reveal great care in arrangement. One noticeable innovation is the method of dissolving one scene into the next following and into the titles. There is none of that chopping off of scenes abruptly that is so destructive of illusion. The Hepworth idea is a great improvement and adds much to the pleasure of looking at motion pictures. American producers might adopt it to advantage.

"VENDETTA" (Eclectic).

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

Set among the eternal splendors of Sicilian landscapes, this production in scenic beauty far surpasses the ordinary colored film feature. The rich tints of Southern sky and foliage as well as the picturesque costumes of Sicily abounding in color contrasts are reproduced with absolute fidelity. We are wont to speak of "glowing" colors when we attempt to describe the glories of a Southern clime. "Glowing" is the word that fits the colors as they show up on the screen in this feature. No feature could be more pleasing to the eye.

The plot is of the typical conventional Italian style, composed in the main of jealousy and "Vendetta," which in the South of Italy are quite as popular as spaghetti and frascati. The acting is at times a trifle stagy and the villain is a distinct camera villain. There is plenty of action in the feature and enough of that "thrill" which in these days seems to be so highly valued by exhibitors. It must be said that some of the incidents are obviously improbable. The stream which the lovers were afraid to cross could very evidently been forded with little damage to the shoes and no damage whatever to the stockings. The placing of the "victim" on the swing seemed somewhat odd unless it was done for the personal comfort of the artiste. The suspending of the heroine in mid-air and the gradual cutting of the rope are very sensational and well carried out.

JACK LONDON COMMENCES SUIT.

An action has been commenced in the United States District Court at Los Angeles, Cal., by Jack London and Frank A. Garbutt to restrain H. M. Horkemier, of the Balboa Amusement Company, from any further production or attempted sale of the Jack London stories in motion pictures.

Mr. London and Mr. Garbutt are interested with Hobart Bosworth in the Bosworth, Inc., which is making pictures from the London stories under Mr. London's personal supervision.

"Sapho"

Splendid Four-Part Paris Eclair Picture Now Being Rented by World Special Films Corporation.

By George Blaisdell.

THE Paris Eclair Company has produced a four-part version of Alphonse Daudet's "Sapho," the rights for which in the United States and Canada have been secured by the World Special Films Corporation. It is a splendid picture. One might, in the book, read this collection of fine pen pictures, with its flowery descriptions, and not experience a thrill. In the picture there are several scenes to stir, and they stir more by reason of the art of the players than on account of any dramatic quality of the book itself. "Sapho" is not "Camille." If the one appeals to the sensual the other does more than this—it tugs at the heart. Fanny Legrand is a wonderful lover, but in the end she proves the theory of reversion to type—the daughter of a dissolute cab driver and an unknown mother discards the man whom she has infatuated but who has never really loved her; who has for her alienated himself from his powerful and highly connected family and also at the last moment renounced a woman he really loved. And she throws Jean Gaussin overboard for whom? For Flamant, a man who so madly loved her that he has committed forgery, the better to throw money to her, and who has, for the crime, served years in jail. But—he is the father of her child.

Scene from "Sapho" (World Special Films Corp.).

Cecile Guyon in the role of Sapho dominates the picture. This wonderful woman has not only youth and beauty; she possesses also in marvelous degree the third and most important factor in this desirable equipment of an actress—brains. Whether it be in the tenderest moments of a woman who has forgotten all her former loves and exists only for one man, or in the stormy scenes with the man who fails to appreciate her great passion, or in the final view we have of her as she meditates on the past and decides the time has come to go with one who blindly loves her, she holds you firmly in the grasp of her great artistry. Charles Krauss is the Jean Gaussin. He gives a finished performance. If in the beginning he looks older than the twenty years of Daudet's character there is ample compensation for the theatrical license in the skill and experience he brings to the interpretation of the youngster from the South who comes to Paris to prepare for the consular service.

The chief supporting characters are chosen with excellent judgment. We do not see much of Daddy Legrand, the broken down nighthawk whose sole care is to possess a "good whip, good lash," but that little is finely done. Uncle Cesaire, the ex-convict, who uncovers to Sapho the family skeleton of the Gaussins, seems to step out of the book. The Hettemas, the stout, well-mated next-door neighbors of Jean and Sapho, as she is known throughout the picture, contribute a bit of comedy to this most serious drama. Caoudal, the blasé old sculptor, the creator of the statue "Sapho" modeled from the figure of Fanny and one of her old-time lovers, is introduced; so also is De Potter, another admirer. The interview between the latter and Jean, wherein the musician, now in the grip of Rosario, warns the young man of the folly of remaining under Sapho's influence, is finely depicted. The young woman who plays Irene Bouchereau, the fiancee of Jean, has not much to do. She suffers by comparison with the superb Guyon—or she may in men's eyes; the women are entitled to a contrary opinion.

The opening scene, the ball at Dechelette's, where Fanny, on sight, falls in love with Jean, is finely staged. The second scene, that of the garden, is likewise charming. The famous staircase episode, where Jean carries his new friend up four flights, is without sensational accompaniment. Some of the best of the situations are where the two are settled in the cottage and Sapho appears as the prim housewife, if the expression be permitted; the destruction of the woman's old love letters to appease the jealousy of Jean; the resulting flames and the extinguishing of the fire by the neighbors; the appeal of Sapho to Jean not to visit his home at Castelet—"it is only a scheme to separate us"; the picnic in the woods with the Hettemas, and the blast on the great horn sounded by Hettema in the ears of the quarreling lovers; the painful scene in the woods following Jean's notification of separation; the sorrow of Uncle Cesaire when he sees the grief of Sapho; the unavailing visit of Sapho to Jean's apartment and the thrusting of the letter under the door. There is realism in the interview which Jean finally seeks with Sapho. When because he believes she has been entertaining Flamant he strikes to the floor the woman whom he has cast back upon the world, she knows her lover has come back to her—that the infatuation still holds. The ending of the picture is as unsatisfactory as is the final chapter of the book. The fact that it is to Flamant, however, Sapho is returning is not indicated in the film, although of those unacquainted with the story it may by some so be deduced.

It must be conceded that the producer has been careful in the handling of a delicate subject. Plainly it has been made for Anglo-Saxons and with due regard for their standards. Exception may be taken to the cigarette-smoking of Sapho. But Miss Guyon did not create the character. Also it may be offered in extenuation that she smokes artistically, not painfully; neither does she make a wry face.

"Sapho" is not only well produced; there are splendid acting, fine settinge, elaborate costumes, large groups, and Eclair photography.

MONOPOL RECEIVERSHIP SET ASIDE.

Following the public notice of the alleged bankruptcy of the Monopol Film Company, of 145 West 45th Street, New York, P. P. Craft, president of the Monopol, filed an affidavit before Judge Hough, of the United States District Court, on September 19, that caused the court to vacate the order for a receiver for the concern.

The bankruptcy petition had been filed by P. A. Powers, Stanner E. V. Taylor and Marion Leonard on the ground that the corporation was bankrupt and owed the petitioners money. Mr. Craft in his affidavit charges that Powers, Taylor and Miss Leonard had entered into a conspiracy to wreck the corporation. He sets forth that he put $9,000 into the concern, which was $4,000 more than his agreement called for. Powers advanced a stipulated sum at the same time, which Mr. Craft maintains cannot be considered as a debt. Mr. Craft further sets forth that Mr. Taylor was to receive one-third of the profits in return for his work as artistic director, and that Miss Leonard has been paid all that is due her as a creditor of the company. Besides this, Craft alleges that Mr. Taylor was furnished $26,000 for operating expenses for which he has rendered no accounting. In view of these countercharges, especially that which points to conspiracy, Judge Howe has not only set aside the application for receivership but has ordered a thorough investigation into the affairs of the Monopol Company.

"LES MISERABLES" FURNISHES TEXT FOR SERMON.

Dr. Meyers, of the Tremont Temple, famous divine and preacher, whose fame is not confined to Boston alone, but who is well known and revered over the entire country, was present at the presentation of the world famed production "Les Miserables," on Tuesday, Sept. 15, at the Tremont Temple. Some idea of the deep impression that this remarkable film has made on the reverend theologian may be had when it is learned that during his sermon on Sunday last he made it the subject of a twelve minute talk. He not only spoke very profoundly concerning the intellectual and educational advantages of a production of the magnitude of "Les Miserables," but also gave it his personal indorsement, advising his hearers to see for themselves this remarkable adaptation of the literary masterpiece made immortal by Victor Hugo.

"His Neighbor's Wife"

Lillie Langtry Appears Before the Camera of the Famous Players in an Interesting Three-Part Story.

By George Blaisdell.

IN "His Neighbor's Wife," to be released on October 10, the Famous Players Film Company will feature the international beauty of a generation ago. Lillie Langtry was known to newspaper readers the world over as "The Jersey Lily," the woman who counted among her admirers reigning monarchs, long before she made her initial appearance on the stage. She brings to the screen much legitimate experience. "His Neighbor's Wife" is a strong story, one of human interest. In two respects aside from others it is an unusual production. One of these is the fact that the entire subject was made inside the studio. The other is the near absence of subtitles. As to the first, those of the uninitiated who see the picture will be skeptical. It is hard to believe that the setting of the great terrace, with its palatial surroundings, is the work of the scenic artist. The same is true of the garden, entered by the great gate swinging between brick posts and containing the rustic summer houses and elaborate benches. The picture when seen by the reviewer was without titles; the story was clear. It is said, however, that two leaders will be inserted so as to bring out more strongly important points. The picture is an elaboration by Mr. Porter of an eighteen-minute vaudeville sketch in which Mrs. Langtry appeared a few years ago. Interest in the story is established right at the start.

Scene from "His Neighbor's Wife" (Famous Players).

Scene from "His Neighbor's Wife" (Famous Players).

The period of the action is contained in a few hours. An army captain leaves his wife and goes to visit Mrs. Norton, the wife of his next-door neighbor. Mr. Norton, returning home unexpectedly, discovers the two. He informs the wife of Captain Roberts of what he has seen and compels her to come with him so that she, too, may be an eye-witness of the clandestine meeting. Norton tells Mrs. Roberts that unless she consents to elope with him he will kill the captain on sight. He gives her until 10 o'clock to decide. Just before that hour the captain returns. His wife upbraids him. Realizing that if she does not go with Norton it will mean the shooting of the captain, who has already discovered her intention of leaving, she feigns illness. As the captain goes for a glass of water the wife steps out on the great terrace attired in the captain's greatcoat and hat and smoking a cigarette. In the dim light Norton looks at his watch. It is 10:10. He shoots at the figure. Mrs. Roberts staggers into the house just as her husband returns. She is not fatally injured; a reconciliation follows.

Mrs. Langtry in the role of Mrs. Roberts will appeal to her audiences. She depicts the injured wife with feeling and skill. Captain Peacocke looks the part of Captain Norton—a fine type. Sidney Mason, who next week will play the lead in "Get Rich Quick Wallingford," plays Mr. Norton and gives a finished performance. Irma La Pierre has the opposite role and does good work. Little Mimi Yvonne is delightful as the child of the Norton home. The photographic effects are of the usual Famous Players quality. The exterior night scenes are artistically tinted. The interiors, whether in the full lamplight or the glow of the fireplace, will charm. There are strong situations. One of these is in the first act when the husband comes to Mrs. Roberts and tells her what he has seen in his garden. Among others are the denunciation of Captain Roberts by the injured wife, after she has seen him in the company of her neighbor, and the final reconciliation after the shooting.

"His Neighbor's Wife" is a good picture; but it is probable that the interest of the older public will center chiefly about the personality of the famous beauty of other days who plays the leading role.

LAEMMLE BACK FROM THE COAST.

Reports Fine Time Despite Injury to Hand Received on Trip—Affairs Working Smoothly on Coast.

CARL LAEMMLE, president of the Universal Film Company, returned to New York on Tuesday, Sept. 16, from a hurried trip to the Universal plant in Los Angeles, Cal. While he declared that he had had the time of his life and did, in fact, look better for the trip, Mr. Laemmle was under the doctor's care on account of severe injury to the fingers of his left hand received on the way out. Mr. Laemmle, at the time the injury was received, was standing in the vestibule of the coach with his hand resting on the door jamb. The door was closed from the inside and caught his fingers, crushing them badly. . Aside from the pain and inconvenience thus occasioned Mr. Laemmle insists that he thoroughly enjoyed himself.

"It was the first time I have ever been to the Coast," said Mr. Laemmle, "and this trip was a revelation to me. I had no conception of the magnitude of the plant and could hardly believe my eyes when I beheld the vastness of our operations at Hollywood. What pleased me was the good feeling that existed among our people. Mr. Bernstein is proving himself an excellent and capable manager and he has secured the confidence of the entire staff. He is very careful and painstaking and I am pleased with the record he is making.

"I did not have a great deal of time to spend on the Coast. Arriving on Sunday, the 14th, I was on my way home on the following Tuesday, but I managed to get a good general idea of our plant. I would like to spend a month out there if I could find the time. You see, we are so busy here in New York improving our plants and product that I have not time for vacations."

R. PRIEUR RETURNS.

Mr. R. Prieur, president of the Lux Film Company, who has been spending the past year and a half in London and Paris, returned to New York on the steamship "Mauretania." It is Mr. Prieur's purpose to put into effect some well planned measures for the increase of Lux sales in America and he will probably remain here some time.

New York Fashion Show in Pictures

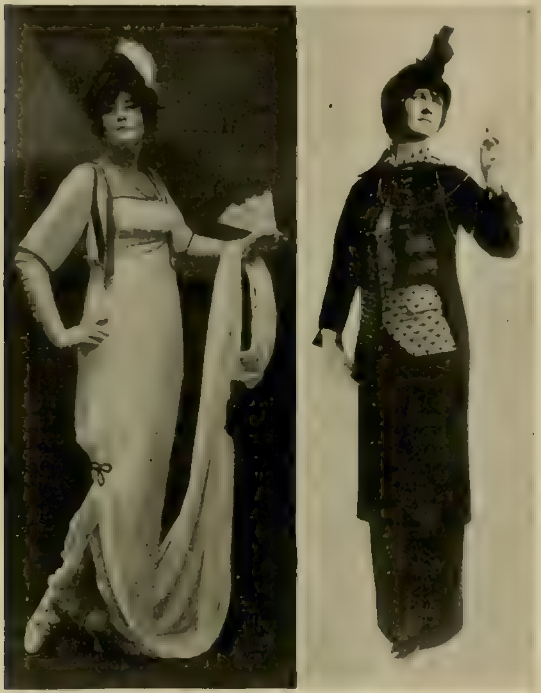
A Systematic Plan for Photographing and Broadcast Exhibition of Latest Styles.

Reviewed by Hugh Hoffman.

THE idea of filming sample styles of clothing and millinery on the living model is not a new thing, but it is only since the last National Fashion Show at the Grand Central Palace, New York, last July, that there has been a company whose sole field of endeavor will be the production of animated fashion plates through the medium of moving pictures. The actual beginnings were made at the recent fashion show when the regular store models were photographed by artificial light in a temporary studio at the Grand Central Palace. Three thousand feet of film were taken at that time.

The underlying idea of the animated fashion plate as a regular business proposition has some attractive angles from the standpoint of the exhibitor and producer. Scarcely anything can be considered a stronger drawing card for the ladies than an exhibition of the latest styles of dress. On his part the producer is helped by his association with the national and international arbiters of fashion whose co-operation gives the pictures the stamp of authenticity. When American women become generally aware that the New York fashion show will be brought to their very doors, it is more than probably that they will be waiting for each new installment as it comes around.



Two Striking Models Shown in Fashion Pictures.

The New York Fashion Show takes place twice a year. In February the spring and summer fashions are exploited and in July the fall and winter styles are shown. The Ny-Fax Film Co., controlled by Wilbur W. Nugent, has secured the exclusive motion picture rights for this exhibition, and will market the pictures on the state rights plan. The field for this series is much wider than theater exhibition alone, as it includes department stores as well. Some of the larger metropolitan department stores already are using motion pictures as an attraction, notably Wanamaker's, New York, and this series of fashion pictures will be used as an incentive for department stores in every city to install projecting outfits. Where a store does not feel justified in going to the expense of fitting up an exhibition room, the plan is for the merchant to work in conjunction with the nearest picture theater, advertising the exhibition and issuing tickets for a private showing in the morning. In case of the department stores of any city not taking up the scheme, the theater manager could exhibit the pictures on his own account and be reasonably sure of a large attendence.

In regard to this particular set of pictures there are technical faults which are noticeable to the practiced eye, but it is not likely that they will obtrude themselves upon ladies who are looking at the pictures for the styles only. In all picture making it is up to the director to make things as easy as possible for the spectator and in this case the rule has not been followed at all times. It seems obvious that a picture, intended to display styles in form and detail, should concentrate upon the form and detail in the garment alone and should not show too much detail in other parts of the picture. A part of this film is, therefore, open to criticism on the ground that there is too much detail in the interior setting. If the director had selected a plainer background, instead of a room overcrowded with gaudy gingerbread scrolls and scallops, it would not have pulled the eye away from the detail of the gowns.

Another shortcoming is that in some parts the figure is not all on the screen. When one is looking over a gown for style it is no more than reasonable to expect a full view of the garment. Moreover, it seems that the models did not take the matter seriously enough. They did nothing to mar the picture by any silly behavior, but it is evident that the director did not impress upon them the fact that it was all supposed to be serious business. They could not be induced to put on make-up and on that account the eyes are lost in some cases. For that and other reasons it would be wise in future issues of this series to employ experienced actresses. The store models do not seem to have the poise. They are selected first of all for the figure and other considerations are secondary. It is a well known fact that some people can wear clothes better than others and it would appear that the way they are worn should be half the battle in a matter of this kind. "Perfect thirty-sixes" devoid of other attractions may be satisfactory to a buyer who has eyes only for the gown, but for public presentation it is necessary to wear stylish clothes in a stylish way, otherwise the models remain mere "manequins," as they are termed in the sub-titles. A woman appearing in a fashionable dress should at least seem to own the dress, and that's why it will take actresses to make the thing convincing.

Now with all that has been said, the pictures are not bad. Those are critical points which will probably be borne in mind when the next set is made. The idea of having a regular fashion feature is a very good one and one that will be a winner everywhere. These pictures with all their faults have enough in them to be of much interest to ladies. To put it briefly, they are good but they could have been better.

In justice to the Ny-Fax Company it should be explained that the idea was conceived by some cloak and suit man who had no practical knowledge of motion pictures. The result was that the original sponsors of the scheme found themselves in much trouble. Then with but a few days in which to work, Mr. Wilbur W. Nugent, a newspaper man of long connection with fashion journals, took over the project and formed the Ny-Fax Company. The first thing he did was to engage Mr. Herman Obrock, Jr., well known as an expert cameraman and all around motion picture technician. Obrock went on the job simply as a camera operator but was quickly given full charge and was later taken into the firm as technical director. The results Mr. Obrock obtained in a few days under the transitory conditions that usually characterize a large exhibit in full momentum, were surprisingly good. They will make a good beginning, and those who are wise enough to get in on the state rights of this proposition at the start will not be sorry as newer and more improved editions come along.

CHARLES DICKSON WITH RELIANCE.

Mr. Charles Dickson, well remembered as star of the comedy classic "Incog" and several other Broadway successes, is not only producing picture dramas for the Reliance Company, but will be seen in the leading role of a picture dramatization of his popular sketch, "The Buffer," which will be released on October 6. Charles Dickson is as well known as an author as he is an actor, having written the musical successes "The Three Twins" and "Bright Eyes" in addition to his more serious works, which include a large number of one-act sketches in vaudeville.

"In Love and War"

Two-Reel Pathe Feature.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

ALL is not fair "in love and war"; to the contrary, a great deal is done in the name of both that is not based on honesty, justice or fairness, and I suppose a thousand stories have been told on the theme embodied in this Pathe release of woman's faith and man's perfidy with an unvarying result, but here is one in which manly men find a remedy and enforce it upon the perpetrator of injustice.

He is a brave and gallant young lieutenant of the Italian army at a time when his country is on the eve of war with Turkey. He becomes infatuated with a country girl of intense love nature and splendid womanhood, one lacking knowledge of the world and experience in life. When her feeble insight into character and motive is pitted against his superior intelligence and that long practice in the craft of heartbreaking that enables a handsome gentleman in uniform to practice a form of enchantment with such women, the result is easily foreseen. He makes a pastime of her unqualified love and trust.

There is no limit to her faith when he is commanded by his general to join his troop in Tripoli, no attempt at consolation during his absence. For such creatures love is eternal. She seeks to elevate herself by work during his absence and thus drifts into the service of a wealthy family. She becomes endeared to them by the very simplicity of character which proved to be a source of weakness when her strength was measured against that of the charming young officer.

This sounds like an old story—and so it is—but it has an unexpected ending, and we are easily carried along by its admirable presentation. The impersonation itself is exceptional. The girl is not one of those slim, correctly-corsetted, chalky looking heroines of marcelled hair that we are asked to accept as types of the country lass. With face and figure of the sculptured quality, physique of dignity and slow movement, she has the fine poise of strength in combination with direct and winning simplicity, a rare type and one very effective for the purpose of the play.

Then there are a lot of enchanting settings, exquisite light effects where interiors are shown and a choice of exteriors that are the despair of American producers. The other parts are taken in harmonious fidelity, so that there is a sense of satisfaction experienced while waiting for the outcome of the situation. The entire photodrama displays what is best described as "atmosphere," the pervading influence of suitable environment. We are transported without jar to a crisis.

The young lieutenant wins a medal for bravery in service and the interest of his commanding officer besides. The latter introduces him into the very family where the country girl has become almost a household member. The head of the family is a splendid type of father with a priceless treasure, a daughter of physical attraction with cultivation added. Backed by his commanding officer, the general under whom he won military honors, the lieutenant wins the daughter and becomes engaged to her. His conduct in the field has covered investigation of his honor as a private gentleman.

The raughter to whom he is engaged one day tells the country girl of her coming happiness and shows the picture of the man she is to wed. The country girl has just come into the drawing room with some flowers, and the father of the young bride-elect and the general are near at hand. A high scene follows, in which silence is eloquent. Every emotion from the first stunning effect of the announcement to the last and vital shock that robs her of consciousness is portrayed by the simple and loving creature who has been wronged.

The revelation that follows is as innocent as that of the betrayed girl's collapse. The effect of it upon the father and the general is correspondingly profound. Their conduct when the young lieutenant appears is a tribute to real manhood. They combine to force the issue in a few dramatic episodes, compelling the young officer to recognize rights lightly disregarded as a rule and bring about a union with the simple girl who was his first and natural choice.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs

By George Blaisdell.

IN the Famous Players' production of "His Neighbor's Wife" Captain Leslie T. Peacocke has the role of Captain Roberts, playing opposite to Mrs. Langtry, "the Jersey Lily." In one of the early scenes Mrs. Roberts kisses her husband as he leaves the house. It is said that this marks the second occasion on which the versatile writer of the Universal staff has been the recipient of a similar salute by the one-time famous beauty. The first was when the captain was a schoolboy at Eton. Mrs. Langtry was visiting a chum of the captain of today, and on her departure included him in her farewell. Quite a bit of water has flowed under the bridges in the intervening years.

Arthur Mackley, who for four years has played in and directed Western Essanay pictures, has formed a new alliance. Mr. Mackley left New York on Saturday, Sept. 20, for the Pacific Coast. When asked as to his particular destination and the name of his new company Mr. Mackley smiled significantly. "When I am settled I'll send you word," he said.

A box containing heather from the "Ould Sod" was received at the World office last week. It was quickly divided among the crew. Thanks are due to Miss Gene Gauntier, to whose thoughtfulness we are indebted for the souvenir.

Irving Cummings began work at the Pathe studio a week earlier than at first arranged. Oscar Apfel, formerly of Edison and later with Reliance, will begin directing pictures at the Pathe studio on September 29. Mr. Cummings will head Mr. Apfel's company, the energies of which will be devoted chiefly to the making of feature productions.

It is apparent there are many men and women, too, for that matter who are seeking employment in picture studios and in some cases getting it upon their statement that they have had stage experience. Also is it true that in many instances their employment is of short duration. One director states that he has given work to six different "leading men" who revealed their inexperience and incapacity before the end of their first scene. He is still looking for a real leading man. An actor-director who was present when the foregoing was related said that when he was making pictures he made it a point, in the case of the first appearance of a player with whose work he was unacquainted, to make his first scene that of the big situation of the picture. If the player was due to fall he would most likely make a mess of it in this scene, and the quick discovery of his "four-flushing" would save the company money.

Owing to the resignations of C. O. Baumann, C. J. Hite and Tefft Johnson as candidates for office in the Screen Club the nominating committee has named Earle Williams of the Vitagraph Company, for third vice-president, William Haddock for recording secretary and Dave Thompson, of the Thanhouser Company, for the Board of Governors for two years.

Abe Warner was in Atlanta, Ga., last Sunday. Mr. Warner will be away from New York for a month longer on a tour of the exchanges of Warner's Features.

Don't take it for granted that because you see a man smoking on the screen it is a certainty that he indulges in the tobacco luxury when not in front of the camera. At the Screen Club the other evening a friend passed a cigar to E. K. Lincoln, who is doing much big stuff for the Vitagraph Company, and asked: "Will you have a smoke?"

"No," said the Vitagraph leading man, "I thank you, but I don't smoke." Noting the puzzled expression that overspread the face of his friend, he added: "That is, only in pictures."

Cold tea may be substituted for whiskey when before the camera, and get over; but there's no getting away from the real pipe or cigar.

Deputy state fire marshals have ordered discontinued the showing of motion pictures in one church in Grand Rapids, Michigan, several theaters and all of the schoolhouses except the high school. In the cases of all but the theaters the officials based their action on the fact that the pictures are not shown on the first floor, as the law requires. In the case of the school buildings the suppression will seriously interfere with the plans for social center work during the winter.

ILLINOIS' CONVENTION AT PEORIA.

Most Representative Gathering Yet Held in that State. Bolters Denied Admission.

By James S. McQuade.

THE convention for the re-organization of the Illinois Branch of the M. P. E. L. of America and the election of state officers was held at the Jefferson Hotel, Peoria, Tuesday and Wednesday, September 23 and 24. The National President M. A. Neff presided. Over thirty exhibitors participated in the deliberations which were of a harmonious character throughout. About thirteen exhibitors of the International Motion Picture Association from Chicago arrived in the city on Monday. They were given entrance to the opening session Tuesday morning but were denied admittance to the executive session immediately following and were not permitted to take part in any of the remaining meetings. J. D. Rose, Marion Theater, and F. W. Schaefer, of the Crystal, Chicago, were received as regular members of the League having explained that they were not members of the International Association and had not severed connection with the League. President Neff welcomed them and stated that any member of the Association, excluding the delegates to the recent National Convention in New York City, would also be welcomed after declaring their allegiance to the League and their severance from the International.

Mr. Rose, previously mentioned, gained the floor during the first executive meeting and asked President Neff if the thirteen Chicago exhibitors excluded from the room might be admitted. Mr. Neff replied at length and explained that it was totally out of his power to admit them because they had been suspended by the members of the National Body in convention assembled at New York, after they had walked out of the hall and formed another organization. According to the constitution of the League they could not be reinstated except by a vote of the National Body or by the National Executive Committee. So far as he was personally concerned he would be glad to admit the bolters from the various states excepting a few. It was pointed out that Louis H. Frank, an alternate at the National Convention, New York, and who had walked out with the seceders from Chicago, had been admitted to the League and was present, but it was shown that Mr. Frank was considered an alternate by his confreres for the reason that he attended the convention at his own expense, also that he had not participated in the voting and besides he had severed his connection with the International immediately after his return to Chicago. Mr. Neff stated that Mr. Frank was eligible as a member of the League from the fact alone that his name was not included on the list of the seceders expelled by the national body.

In the afternoon session Tuesday, President Neff announced that sixty-three new members had joined the League within the last three weeks and that the entire membership at present is about one hundred. Before closing the afternoon session Tuesday the following committee on constitution and by-laws was appointed by the chair:

Dee Robinson, Peoria; Louis H. Frank, Chicago; Thomas Leonard, Johnston City; E. C. Bostick, Pekin, and I. C. Davidson, Danville.

They reported immediately that it was deemed advisable to adopt the by-laws and constitution of the Ohio State Branch for one year, and the resolution being put it was carried unanimously. The election of a national vice-president and state officers was next in order and the following were declared elected:

National Vice-President, Dee Robinson, Peoria; State President, Louis Frank, Chicago; First State Vice-President, Thomas Leonard, Johnston City; Second Vice-President, Ed. H. Harris, Peoria; Secretary, E. C. Bostick, Pekin; Treasurer, I. C. Davidson, Danville; Corresponding Secretary, C. E. Carrier, Peoria; Sergeant-at-Arms, Mr. Weisbruch, Peoria.

Wednesday morning's session was occupied by the installation of officers. A grievance committee comprised of the following members was also formed: S. Law, Carlinville; H. Lubiner, Chicago; O. W. Frederick, Pekin; H. Leonard, Johnston City, and Dee Robinson, of Peoria, Chairman.

It was then moved and carried that the next State Convention of Illinois be held in Chicago on the second Tuesday and Wednesday in March, 1914. Wednesday afternoon was devoted to sight-seeing in autos, the great Clark's distillery, the largest in the world, being visited. Wednesday evening a banquet was held at the Jefferson Hotel, among the guests being Mayor Woodruff, Senator Dailey and quite a number of ladies of Peoria.

MAINE EXHIBITORS IN CONVENTION.

The second meeting of the Maine State Branch, No. 29, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, was held in Bangor, Me., at the Penobscot Exchange Hotel, last week. The attendance was very large, and much enthusiasm manifested by the Maine exhibitors, who are firmly ranged on the side of National President M. A. Neff, on the present controversy. After the transaction of purely routine business, and taking favorable action on the application of ten exhibitors for membership, it was then unanimously voted to appoint a committee on grievances, to whom shall be referred all complaints against film exchanges, for unfair treatment and unjust discrimination. The committee was immediately appointed by President Moxley Blumenburg. It was also voted to ask National President Neff to name a date on which he could confer with the Maine Branch at Lewiston, for the purpose of suggesting ways and means of obtaining hearings on complaints. It was also voted to pay weekly visits to any theater unjustly discriminated against by any film exchange, and to install vaudeville, in preference to motion pictures, in any theater really suffering from unfair treatment. A fund of several hundred dollars was raised as an evidence of good faith and unity of co-operation. The entire atmosphere of this meeting was virile and healthy, and this branch is bound to become powerful in its influence. President Blumenberg has every reason to be proud of his efforts in this cause. A number of exchange men journeyed from Boston to Bangor, to meet the "boys," including Manager J. A. Eslow (Universal), Edward Farrell (General Film), Assistant Manager George I. Appleby (Mutual) and R. D. Marson. F. A. Clark (Motiograph), Bert Bohannon (Power's) and David Cowan (Simplex), were also on the job.

Besides the business transacted, there was a general good time for everyone, and the general opinion is that this meeting served to impress all the Maine boys with the unquestioned benefits to be gained by being an active, enthusiastic member of the Branch. HENRY.

NEW YORK STATE CONVENTION.

October 15 and 16 are the dates set for the convention of the New York Motion Picture Exhibitors' League meeting, at Rochester, N. Y. This is the meeting that was adjourned from Syracuse. President Neff will be present to assist and there is likely to be a large attendance. New York exhibitors who desire to affiliate with the big league should make arrangements to attend. For particulars address A. N. Wolf, president, Colonial Theater, Rochester, N. Y.

SANDUSKY EXHIBITORS MEET.

A meeting of the exhibitors affiliated with the Sandusky Local No. 7, was held at Freemont, Ohio, on September 16. President Neff was a guest of the convention, which was very successful. Resolutions were adopted requesting the Universal Company to withdraw the Imp release of September 18, entitled "Escaped from an Asylum," as an unfit subject. Manufacturers were also asked to have posters made for each reel when issuing multiple reel subjects.

Foreign Trade Notes

BRITISH NOTES.

AFTER three years of rigorous censorship the pictures of the memorable Johnson-Jeffries fight, taken at Reno, Nev., in 1910, have become public property and have been exhibited this week as an exclusive in the vaudeville theaters on the Moss Empire circuit. As a notable instance of the readiness of the stage to seize upon anything exceptional in the moving picture line this will long remain in the memory of British exhibitors. Only a fortnight ago the Moss Empire management refused to allow Jack Johnson to appear in person at their London theater owing to the public outcry against him. However, as soon as the tumult subsided they have laid hold of the films with eagerness and quickly made the most of them.

One of the best and most attractive advertising novelties I have seen emanates from the London office of a French firm. It consists of a small model in plaster of one of their comedians and in every detail of dress and facial expression, the miniature is faithful to the impersonations on the films. So far I have only seen three artistes so reproduced, namely, André Deed, Max Linder and Chas. Prince, all of the Pathe Co., but surely there is room for an American company with a large staff of artists to extend the idea. Small imitation marble ornaments of John Bunny, G. M. Anderson, King Baggot and other photoplayers of established popularity in characteristic attitudes should prove a remunerative side-line for the exhibitor. The manufacturers, instead of seeking to make a profit on the article, would no doubt, be satisfied with the permanent and free advertisement that the novelty would always be. (Mr. Bunny was "done" in plaster some months ago—Ed.)

Mr. J. D. Tippett, the manager, on this side, for the Universal Film Co., is at present negotiating for offices in London for the company whose policy it is to more actively contest the European market. Hitherto Universal films have been handled in this country by two agencies. It is not stated, however, whether or not the Universal Co. intend to produce their own scenarios in England. Another American concern I suspect of having deep and well-laid designs in this latter direction is the Selig Co. "W. N. S." arrived in London a day or two ago and throughout the better part of the week has been engaged with Mr. Montague, at the London offices of the Selig Polyscope Co. To his numerous interviewers Mr. Selig was as optimistic as ever and carefully avoided committing himself upon any of the industrial controversies at present rife in England and the U. S. A.

In response to the question "Will cinemas do the theater harm?" Sir J. Forbes Robertson (now, perhaps, the most distinguished photoplayer in the world), says: "In the first case I ought to say that perhaps they might take away a certain portion of the usual audiences of suburban and provincial theaters but I think that in the end they will—if the proper plays are produced by men who really know their work—increase the theater-going public and stimulate a greater demand for good, healthy drama."

There has been some strong and averse comment by London newspaper writers recently on the action of the U. S. Government in permitting a section of the American Navy to be used for moving pictures in the film "Victory." This is being released here by the M. P. Sales Agency and the publicity so given to the production, judging from the bookings, seems to have been nothing more than a glorified advertisement.

The supreme attractiveness of topical controversies crystallized into a film drama was never better illustrated than by the film "A Fallen Idol" shortly to be released by the well known Anglo-American enterprise, Messrs. C. Francis Clave and Joseph J. Bamberger, who will be remembered through the Siberia-Alaska motion pictures. The principal painting in this year's Academy represents a repentant woman kneeling at her husband's feet and the film story is woven around this theme. At the end of the film is not the expected reunion between husband and wife, but a reproduction of the scene constituting the Academy picture and followed by the sub-title "Will He Forgive Her." The producers term the film a cinema problem and although it has not been conspicuously advertised, the novelty of the idea will assure its success. Mr. Maurice Elvey, of New York, was the producer. Another striking departure by the same firm is "Spiritualism Exposed," a drama revolving around the recent sensational exposures of the "tricks of the trade" of the crafty spiritualist.

Ex-Quartermaster Edward Munroe, of the American Navy, who fought with the Northern forces in the Civil War, celebrated his 104th birthday here last week by witnessing "The Battle of Gettysburg."

It will interest American readers of Sir A. Conan Doyle to know that his famous Sherlock Holmes stories have been filmed. The first, "The Speckled Band," will be released on October 27th, and has been played by a theatrical company of players. The Fenning Film Service, of London, are the holders.

Two hundred and fifty dollars a day for a photoplayer is not so bad. Yet the Barker Company, of London, is still advertising for an actor. There is only one condition which bars thousands. He must be the exact "double" of the late King at the age of 52. He would be required to play in the "Life of Queen Victoria" without using make-up.

At the moment of writing, several film producers in this country are hunting high and low for Mr. George Bernard Shaw, whose newest play "Androcles and the Lion," was produced the other day. It looks very much that "G. B. S." will remain "engaged" to film agents for some time, or at least until tempted by a very substantial offer.

For those interested in the scientific and mechanical side of the industry I have obtained from specifications at the British Patent Office particulars of recent applications for protection for the following: Messrs. R. G. Bradshaw and J. C. Lyell for a machine for use in the preparation and manufacture of films for natural color cinematography. The Eclair Co., of France, for improved machines for cutting stencils for the coloring of films. Mr. R. A. Pringle for a clip for temporarily joining films. Mr. T. P. Middleton for the manufacture and use of cinematograph negative bands. Mr. Chas. Breedon for a system for taking moving picture films in colors. Mr. E. A. Lanste for apparatus for the simultaneous photographic reproduction of movement and sound, and Mr. J. C. Pope for the production of stereoscopic pictures. Mr. E. M. Johnstone, of Birmingham, has invented a device for closing the operating box aperture in case of fire. The sliding shutters are connected with a pivoted lever worked either by a cord or pressure.

A peculiar device is that of Mr. A. Gottschalk and Mr. G. Thiemann, of Bochum, Germany. It provides for the film carrying appliances on a projector being mounted on a kind of movable platform under which is a large tank of water. The parts are held in position by holders which fuse at a certain temperature and allow the films to descend into the tank. A chimney above passes the smoke and steam out of the building while another attachment switches up the lights in the auditorium. A combination of color screens to obtain multi-colored effects has been presented for patent by Mr. T. W. Watts of Brighton. It consists of a single rectangular glass plate made up of differently colored sections and is fixed in a suitable position betwcen the film and the lens. The colored sections are so mounted that they may be moved by the operator into almost any desired position, thus giving to an otherwise monochrome film a combination of tints. Different color effects can also be produced by superimposing the different colored glasses over one another, while by tilting the screen, deeper tints can be brought into the image without changing from the same color.

Under the name of Anglo-American Films, Ltd., a new company, for the production, manufacture and hiring of films, is being got together in Edinburgh. Its activities will be confined to Scotland. To the writer the name of the company seems to be a misnomer as directors, solicitors and staff are all being recruited locally. The capital is $125,000.

FROM SOUTH AFRICA.

The Bioscope business in South Africa during the last three months has undergone many startling changes. For instance, throughout South Africa we had as many as eight film exchanges, most of which are now merged into one and this is known as "African Film Trust."

Mr. Schlesinger, who is the head of affairs, is an American and fairly makes things hum. He is also responsible for the forming of the "African Theaters Trust" which has brought all the different theaters under one management.

There are two other services in South Africa, one which is known as the "International Film Supply Co.," is managed by Mr. Walter Clarke. This firm is doing a big business throughout the country, having two complete circuits. One of the partners in the firm (a Mr. Rosenberg), was unfortunately shot during the strike.

The other firm standing out of the Trust, is the "Independent Film Supply Co.," managed by Mr. McNeil.

Messrs. Pathe Freres are also established in a very big way, having a big machine and accessory department. This firm gets out all the new films three months in advance of the London release and these are shown in their private theater. Pathes also have a film-taking department and have turned out some very excellent topicals and scenics. The biggest hit they have made so far being the strike film in which they have shown actual fighting in the streets. Such a subject has never been filmed here before.

There are two theaters in Johannesburg which stand out of the trust. One is the Carlton, managed by Mr. Bloomfield and which does very big business, and the other is the Bijou, managed by Mr. Blond. The latter house shows only pictures, whereas all the other moving picture palaces not only show pictures but give three of four very excellent variety turns as well.

Durban in Natal possesses as many as eight picture shows, while East London has four and Port Elizabeth twelve.

In Capetown and Suburbs, Bioscope shows are too many to enumerate. The Principal is managed by Mr. Wolfram and the Alhambra by Mr. Potts.

Among the films popular in South Africa, are a good many of the American make. Vitagraph, A. B., Kalem, Lubin, Nestor, Rex, Solax and many others. In the country districts the "Wild West" picture is in great demand, while in the towns the human drama is always in favor. The schools of South Africa are seriously thinking of taking up and installing the Bioscope in their establishments for the benefit of the children, and should this occur, there are prospects of very big business being done in the educational film line.

Kimberley and Bloomfontein both possess half a dozen shows each while all the small "dorps" have at least one picture house.

Films that caused a great sensation in South Africa were "Les Miserables" and "Quo Vadis?"

ROTHACKER BUYS LAEMMLE'S INDUSTRIAL STOCK.

Announcement is officially made that Carl Laemmle has relinquished his holdings in the Industrial Moving Picture Company to Watterson R. Rothacker, who by his purchase of the Laemmle stock gains control of that concern. At a recent meeting of the directors of the Industrial Moving Picture Company Mr. Rothacker was elected as president, to succeed Carl Laemmle, and will continue as general manager. Mr. Laemmle explains his sale of the stock by the statement: "I am concentrating all my efforts and giving my entire attention to the Universal Film Manufacturing Company and have disposed of my holdings in the Industrial Moving Picture Company for this reason alone."

NEWMAN COMPANY ENLARGES.

The Newman Manufacturing Company, 717-721 Sycamore Street, Cincinnati, Ohio, and 101-103 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y., have just added another floor to their Cincinnati plant, and have installed additional machinery and equipment. This addition was necessary on account of their increased business in theater equipment, especially brass frames and easels and brass railing.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

WITH the close of the summer season and the harvest moon assuming full proportions the annual crop of unsophisticated and credulous people are found entwined in the webs woven by the shrewed schemers of the larger cities. Along the highways and by-ways leading from the "halls of learning to the fields of fortune and fame" may be found at this particular time hundreds of victims who are just awakening to a realization of the inhumanity of the human race. These reflections are brought up by a survey of the field of institutions that paint glowing pictures of the advantages to be gained by a summer course of instruction with special reference to the schools devoted to the line of dramatic art. It is a pitiful spectacle to see the number of young men and women who have conscientiously labored during the hot summer to equip themselves for achieyements in the histrionic field and who find themselves practically nothing more than puppets in the hands of designing people.

The motion picture field is one of the most sought goals of these innocents at this time. Strange as it may seem many of the victims are people who display more than ordinary intelligence and learning. A few days ago a young woman of this calibre and equally attractive physically presented herself at a motion picture studio and applied for a position on the staff of players. The conversation led the manager to suspect that the applicant was an interviewer assigned by some publication to lay a foundation for some new form of attack upon the industry and he very frankly made known his suspicions. The applicant was just as frank and eagerly grasped the opportunity to convince the manager she was acting in good faith.

The readers of the Moving Picture World are no longer only those who are connected with the motion picture business, and for that reason it is well that the information and protection of the outsider's that the experience of the young woman referred to be given. She stated that until the early part of the summer she was engaged in business in one of the western cities. Having heard that capable people were in constant demand as players in the picture field and that the opportunities for advancement and pecuniary gain were plentiful, she sold out the business and sought a school of instruction in this city. She was informed that all she had heard was true and all that was required was coaching. The managers, she said, referred to the question of opportunity as the least important, pointing out that professional people who fill the parts in pictures during the summer flock back to the stage in the fall and leave the studio fields open. "I have been studying since last June," the young woman continued, "and my diploma is due, so I thought it time to look about for an opening. The outlook is not encouraging. Naturally I sought the foremost companies and at all of them I am told that they take on professional people. Now what do you mean by the term 'professional'? I am quite sure the instruction I have received has qualified me, and a very prominent player tells me that my work is entirely satisfactory." The applicant was informed that the term covered actual stage experience—the practical knowledge of stagecraft. "Well," the young woman continued, "I must confess that I cannot charge the school with misleading me in that direction. They told me that upon the completion of the course I would be as good as some of the best professionals now in the business. They did not say the course would make me a professional. The distinction is quite clear. But, with all that, I feel I have been deceived. When I made known my intention to apply for a position one of the managers advised me not to say I was a school graduate and to answer in the affirmative when asked if I had experience. I have always endeavored to be truthful and straightforward and for that reason did not pretend that I had experience. Can't you refer me to some company that would be willing to give me a trial. I see now that it would be foolish for me to spend any more time and money at the school. Most of my money has been spent and it would be almost heart-breaking to try and build up my business again."

The studio manager who figured in the conversation stated that the applicant was one of the most promising he had met. It was beyond his power to place her, but he endeavored to direct her to a place where she might "get a chance." No doubt she will be heard from as a winner. The case is an exceptional one and should not be overlooked by the uninitiated who may be tempted to follow in her footsteps. When young women of this kind find themselves before the barrier of exclusion after earnest and apparently successful study what chance has the less intelligent and serious? The latter predominate, consequently the crop of dupes is large. All the schools of instruction refute the charge that they dupe their pupils, and it must be admitted that some of them can substantiate the refutation when a charge of deliberate duping is made, but in the opinion of those directly connected with the motion picture business the system is within the sphere of criticism.

In the first place, by inference or otherwise, the people are wrongfully led to believe that the growth and development of the motion picture business has made the establishment of such schools a necessity; that there is a scarcity of talent; and, quite frequently, people are led to believe that the schools are co-operating with the studios. Some of the institutions make capital of their boasted influence and claim to be able to place their graduates with companies. Others point out how thousands of people have secured positions on the stage through courses of instruction, but fail to enlighten the applicants as to the distinction between the stage and the studio. The greatest evil lies in the concealment of the fact that there is more talent at hand for the motion picture field than can be used and that there is not a studio in the country that is dependent upon schools for material. If professionals leave to return to the stage the vacancies can be so quickly filled from the reserve list that the departures receive only passing notice.

It has been stated there are motion picture studios that are in league with certain schools of instruction, but there does not appear to be foundation of the statement. If such is the case some steps should be taken to suppress both as a conspiracy to defraud as, upon the face of it, such a combination is not feasible along legitimate lines. No studio could care for the graduates that are ground out. At best they could afford but temporary employment. Otherwise they could not make room for the succeeding graduates. The statement that the schools sometimes develop valuable "finds" that would otherwise remain undiscovered is no justification for the continuance of a system that misleads thousands. If the schools had independent support and the instruction was free, or placed at a nominal cost, the contention would hold good.

There was a time when a field was open to schools for instruction of motion picture players. That was when the producers were obliged to depend almost wholly upon amateurs and inexperienced people and professionals maintained a dignity that would not permit them to participate in the pictures. But that time has faded away. The best professionals on the stage are now in the field and there is a surplus of the less talented for the minor parts. All the studios of standing have a surprising waiting list at all seasons of the year, and these lists are independent of hundreds of applicants who have been unable to get upon the lists.

MARY HAD A LITTLE PIG.

Miss Mary Fuller.

Who will marry Mary? is a question of absorbing interest to patrons of moving pictures just at present, and while there have been numerous aspirants for that much coveted position, it is rumored that the popular young actress has at last lost her heart to a certain young fellow named Wilfred—we will not tell you his last name because we don't know it, but there is no doubt that he is much attached to Mary also. In fact, she puts a little harness on him, and leads him around at the end of a chain. Wilfred is just a cunning little white pig, but you can see from the picture that he is close to her heart.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by CLARENCE E. SINN

FROM Los Angeles, California:

In some of the theaters having orchestras of four to seven pieces there is a tendency to play music that is absolutely not suited to the requirements of the picture shown, and to arrange their musical program as a sort of counter attraction. This is particularly noticeable when, for instance, the orchestra starts in some battle scene with a piece like "Light Cavalry Overture" and keeps right on playing it through the subsequent action, even though it runs through dainty love scenes and ends, slap bang! in the scene where the heroine's mother dies. If the piece is popular and well played, part of the audience will applaud it—perhaps in a part of the picture where the interest should be most intense.

It seems to be the rule that the smaller the orchestra the more likelihood of playing appropriate music throughout, and when the lonesome piano in the smaller house plays Greig's "Morning," or Mendelsohn's "Spring Song," its a pretty good sign that all's well with the hero on the screen.

Now this is not intended as a roast, but is the result of my own observation. I am not a musician —in fact, only a near photoplaywright, and perhaps have no claim on your time, in which case you may relegate this to the waste basket, but when week after week I see parts of five or six appropriate pieces recommended for a single reel, I feel that I want to see pictures with music that fits.

Sincerely yours, A Music Lover.

One does not need to be a close observer to know that the above is no roast, but a simple statement of fact, though I did not think the practice of giving a "concert program with pictures on the side" extended so far west. The average orchestra leader likes to play good music for his auditors, but objects to the least deviation from the printed copy on the grounds that any change from the composers work would be "butchering" the number. Overtures, medleys and selections—in fact, any numbers made up of several different movements are almost never exactly fitted to a picture in their original forms. Of course, it is conceivable than a picture might fit such a number, but if so it would be an accident. Take the overture in question as an example. "The Light Cavalry" opens with a heavy brassy maestoso movement, followed by an agitato. The third movement is a 6/8 lively; the fourth a dirge, and the last a lively 6/8 similar to the third movement. In all there are four distinct movements, each expressing something of a character entirely different from the others. Any one of these movements is complete in itself, and each could be used in a different scene should occasion require, but when the average leader plays "The Light Cavalry Overture," he plays it through to the bitter end regardless of the action on the screen. The dirge may come in the liveliest part of the action and the finale in a quiet scene and ninety-nine times out of a hundred it will end "slap bang!" just where it shouldn't end. The average overture plays about eight or ten minutes. The average reel of a thousand feet is run in fifteen or eighteen minutes. Selections run approximately ten or twelve minutes —sometimes a little longer, but none in ordinary use play as long as a thousand feet of film will run; consequently the number always ends somewhere near the middle of the picture—usually stopping with a loud flourish in the very place where music is most particularly needed. Mr. W. Stephen Bush, who has recently returned from an extended tour through Europe, says that in the better class of German picture theaters large orchestras are employed under the direction of an efficient leader who selects and adapts music to fit the picture exactly. He views the picture first—something in the nature of a rehearsal—and then chooses standard music of a fitting character, and this music is humored and played according to the action on the screen. They are not afraid of "butchering" good music by adapting it to the requirements of the work they are doing. They realize that the prominent composers did not write with a view to fitting some particular picture, or they with their intense dramatic sense would have made it fit. So these German musicians, when they choose old standard compositions to accompany their pictures (music which was originally written for something entirely different), adapt this music to the work in hand. That is what they are there for; it is impossible to compose new music each day for the pictures, but it is possible to choose the works of other composers and fit it with some degree of fidelity to your show.

And how about selections—operatic and otherwise? Is it "butchery" to alter them in any particular? You are not following the composers idea when you adhere to the routine of movements as laid out in a published selection, but the ideas of the fellow who arranged it—and sometimes his ideas may be no better than yours. At any rate the selection was made for concert purposes and not for moving picture work. I will ask any leader, if he were requested by a producer to arrange appropriate music for a new picture to be published with the picture—let us say "Bohemian Girl" for example—and he had plenty of time, wouldn't he prefer to take a score of the opera and fit his picture with the music Balfe wrote to the identical scenes for which they were written? That would be following the composer's idea wouldn't it? The picture wouldn't run exactly with the opera score either in time or sequence, but the story is the same and the music, for the essential scenes at least, could be chosen from almost any one of the many selections. But the average leader it seems, would rather take a selection arranged by Jones or Brown or Robinson and play it just as it stands. He mustn't repeat any movements three or four times even if the scene should require; it isn't printed that way. He mustn't cut one of the movements short before reaching the end of it; that would be butchery. And all the time, if he would but realize it, he is not following the composers ideas in the least. He is probably playing "The Fair Land of Poland," in the scene where Balfe wrote gipsy music, and about the place where the Count is grieving for his lost Arline the music is working up a vigorous finale—biff bang, biff bang, ta-da-a-a. And then dead silence in a scene where "The Heart Bowed Down" should have been heard throughout. The same holds good with almost any selection or overture in almost any picture. True, there are some pictures in which it doesn't seem to make much difference, but in the majority, if a selection or overture is played, the different movements can be chosen with an eye to their fitness to the action on the screen; and each movement can be repeated so long as there is need, or curtailed when the action requires a different musical accompaniment. Frequently a movement can be altered by a change in tempo—faster or slower—enough to give it the proper character. But it is very, very, very seldom that the "slam-bang" finale has any business to be played anywhere but at the end of a reel; and sometimes not even there.

And how about other concert music? Salon pieces and character numbers generally. Must you invariably play it "once through and coda"? If the general character of the picture runs a little longer than the piece you are playing, can't you go back to the beginning and fill up the scene with this appropriate music rather than come to a dead stop? If you were playing a similar scene in a dramatic theater you would keep up the music until your cue was given to stop; and then you would stop whether you played the coda or not. The reason you hear so much of this sort of thing in picture orchestras is not because the leaders object to "butchering" the music; the real reason is because it is too much trouble to follow the pictures. It is far easier to lay out a program of good concert music, and play each number just as it is, regardless of the picture than to try to choose suitable music and then play it to fit the scenes. I will admit that it is often more satisfactory to a musician to play standard music just as it is written—he is used to hearing it that way; he played it that way long before moving pictures were invented maybe, and it sounds "choppy" and incomplete and altogether unsatisfactory if it isn't played as written. He says the composer knew how he wanted it. Very true if you are playing a concert. But in a moving picture theater the pictures are—or should be—the show, and the music is—or should be—an accessory thereof. It isn't necessary to follow a picture scene by scene; that is seldom practical with an orchestra, though easy with a piano or organ. But when the orchestra is playing a number in keeping with the atmosphere of the picture, it should be considered essential to play that number as long as the action requires and no longer. When two scenes rapidly alternate (cut-back), play to the more important scenes and subdue for the others. When the character of the picture changes more permanently, change your music to fit.

GAUNTIER PLAYERS IN IRELAND.

Miss Gauntier Write of the Hearty Welcome Given the Troupe of Picture Players on their Arrival at Beaufort.

Beaufort, County Kerry, Ireland,
August 29, 1913.

Editor of the Moving Picture World:

Well, here we are back in dear old Ireland, and it really seemed like coming back home; so many dear familiar spots, so many friendly faces. Even the dog, Brandy, and Black Jack, the favorite horse, were glad to see us. As for the people, from the Gap of Dunloe to Killarney we are greeted in quaint Irish terms of welcome, and women and children run to the cottage doors to wave to us as we go by.

We miss very much the jolly old crowd of "globe trotters"—those O'Kalems, of course, and inquiries for them and their health are heard on every side. We still speak of "Bob's room" and "Mack's room" and "George's room," so closely associated are the old memories and the old loves with Beaufort.

Our voyage was beautiful, with a sea like a millpond and unusually pleasant traveling companions. Mr. Olcott, Mr. Clark, Mrs. Montgomery and I went on to London while the others disembarked at Queenstown. Arrived in London, Friday night, and left Saturday evening, yet in that time we visited new picture shows, selected a hundred or more costumes, engaged actors for Ireland, interviewed newspaper men, took a number of scenes in London streets, attended to a European business and found time to take Mrs. Montgomery shopping and to see some of the London sights. Jack says if we keep up this pace long all that will be left of the G. G.'s will be a few bruises.

I am sending a box of Irish heather which I wish you would distribute with my compliments. All send very best regards.

As ever,
GENE GAUNTIER.

NEW FEATURE COMPANY.

H. J. Palmer, of Knoxville, Tenn., a recent visitor at the New York offices of the Moving Picture World, announces the formation of the United States Film Co., incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, with a capital of $100,000, for the purpose of handling feature pictures. It is proposed to open offices in New York and London to facilitate the selection of a program, and branch offices will be established at suitable points throughout the country for the distribution of pictures to exhibitors. Already the company has branches in North Carolina, Virginia, Florida, Texas, Tennessee and Louisiana. Mr. Palmer has been handling commercial pictures for several years and is familiar with the demands of the trade.

SLEVIN TO FILM THE POPE.

James Slevin, a former Pathe photoplaywright who went to Europe last spring on a secret mission, has returned to America and announces that he has succeeded in accomplishing what he started out to do, which was to obtain the appointment as official kinematographer to the Vatican. Mr. Slevin is now working on a motion picture script of the "History of the Catholic Church." He expects to return soon to Rome and commence the actual work of making pictures of the Pope and the Vatican.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Discouraging.

EVERY little while something comes along to raise anew the question as to whether exhibition methods really are getting as much better as we want to think.

The other day a man legally declared to be a lunatic and certainly a murderer, broke out of the insane asylum where he was sent to save him from the electric chair. It was a sensational escape, not alone because of its daring, but because of the fact that this man's family possessed money, but the man is a murderer, presumably a lunatic, and certainly unworthy of intelligent interest. The newspapers, particularly those newspapers that are fond of attacking what they are pleased to call the "movies," when greater sensation is lacking, gave columns to the escape and the subsequent legal moves, and immediately the exchanges dug far down into the junk heaps for the films that were current at the time of the murder, unearthing to the public nostrils a stench that had been buried for several years. New pictures were made of the man, his keepers, his various temporary prisons and anything else that could be scraped together and were distributed broadcast. The Keith theaters, that once went so far as to censor Shakespeare, announced the film as a "headliner," offsetting the appearance of this man's wife at a New York theater, and all the lesser vaudeville and most of the picture houses followed suit.

We think this is a mistake. Thousands of persons turned from vaudeville to the picture play because of the growing nastiness of vaudeville, with its naked Salome dancers and other displays of nudity, yet these theaters, for the sake of the money of the moment, have followed the vaudeville houses and have sought to make capital of the escape from prison of an erotic drunkard, whose sole claim to notice above the hundreds of other criminal insane is that his family has more money than most of us.

It is not making money when you gain a few dollars and lose a few hundreds, and we think that some houses will find that their lurid advertising of this sensation will react in a loss of attendance; not immediately noticeable, but none the less real. You may not notice a ten or twenty cent loss in the day's receipts, but if a catering to sensation has cost a patron who attended a ten cent house on an average of twice a week, it means a loss of ten dollars a year.

Next time a sensation that rises from filth and crime comes along think beyond the day after to-morrow. Think of next week, and next month and next year. This may seem like an extreme view, but it is not. If we had one of two houses in a small town, we should prefer that our opposition should get the flash reels that we might catch the patrons on the rebound. One has only to compare the class and size of the vaudeville audiences today with those of the pre-nudity era to realize the truth of this statement. No lasting success has ever been or ever can be based on the exploitation of the immoral or the vulgar.

Six Inch Titles.

The Lyric Educator, St. Matthews, S. C., must be getting some old films. A paragraph advises the reader not to believe that the machine is running too fast when the title flashes and disappears before it can be read. "The titles are thirty inches long (of film)," the Educator explains, "and some time only five or six inches long." The reel is started out with ten to fifteen feet of title. The reader is also told why it is that a man seen on one side of the room suddenly seems to jump to the other side.

The Educator is a four-page leaflet that aims to be chatty. The weekly program is part of the running story and the points of the film are well picked up. One of the general paragraphs puts this proposition to the reader:

> If you don't go to the Lyric you are losing—and we are, too. Why don't you try to do something to stop all this loss.
> All we ask is an opportunity to "show you." If you are afraid to risk a dime on our say-so, call around and get a "show-me" ticket. They're free—to "Doubting Thomases."

Another paragraph adds that slight alterations have made the seats more "sit-on-able." When the editor gets more familiar with preparing copy, the text will read more smoothly. It is only in its third number yet, and a start in the right direction.

Likes Lectures.

J. Lindsay Beer, of the Gypsy Queen Theater, Sewickley, Pa., writes that he is getting good results with the Fitzgerald lectures, and suggests that others might do as well. We did not know that Mr. Fitzgerald syndicated his lectures. He is connected with the Cameraphone Theaters, in Pittsburgh, and is their star feature. The information may interest other exhibitors who use licensed features.

Mr. Beer sends a neat looking program with apologies for the compositor, who got the type in wrong and does not follow chronological order.

Mr. Beer advances the theory that it does not pay to give the full story of the film, and we agree with him in this. It is better to stick to telling something about the film and leave the story for the showing of the subject. He gives only part of the back page to advertising, holding three pages for the house use and using it to advantage. It does not pay to give up too much of your space to the outside advertisers.

Art in Ohio.

A. J. Lane, of the Princess Theater, Delphos, Ohio, is a poet and artist as well as a manager. He is a better manager than artist and a far better artist than poet, for this is his picture and this is his poem:

It draws the eye
It brings them in.
It gets the nickels
It makes me grin

Mr. Lane is no Rembrandt and we positively refuse to admit that he is an Alfredaustin, but he gets something in his lobby that is different from what the others show, and that, after all, is the main thing. The drawing is crude, but it is spirited and not without technic.

Admitted a Frost.

A. W. Bailenger, of the Dean Theater, York, Nebraska, writes:

> Am inclosing herewith two clippings from the daily newspaper of this place. The one is a copy of the advertising we do on a daily change of pictures. Notice the first three lines under the heading, also the last few lines above the name of the theater. The news item on the other clipping was dictated by myself. The occasion was a local picture made by an Omaha firm of the militia maneuvers of the Nebraska National Guard and was used by us the fourth of this month to a good business and to please the local company of the guards. It was a very indistinct picture, showing amateur camera work, and was disappointing to many. Lots left the theater sore. The following day we came out with the inclosed stuff in the local paper, with the result that we had practically as large a crowd back for the show, which was entirely different from the fourth, on the fifth.
> We have made our aim like our motto on the letter head (always a dime's worth), and by combining this with utter frankness, we have established an enviable reputation. No big splurge to get the dime goes with us. We want the "rep" and are going to maintain > it We believe in getting the thin dime every night instead of a big wad once and quitting. Have never tried the weekly program stunt, but firmly believe it will reach into the homes of the more exclusive and create a higher standing for the picture show than any other form of advertising. May try it soon.

> We derive great benefits from the department and hope to get many more. It certainly has our best wishes.

The top line merely states that all programs are subject to delay in railroading. The bottom line runs:

"The picture of the Sham Battle, which was run last night was the poorest we have ever shown. The above described pictures are some of the good ones we show." The other paragraph was a news item in which it is made clear that the house management shared the regret of the audience and was as badly sold.

Be Careful of Locals.

The house met a disagreeable situation frankly and honestly and lost no friends through frankness, but it's a good plan to insist seeing these local features before they are booked. Few local companies or camera men are yet competent to turn out really good work, and to book for feature of this sort for the sake of the local pull without having seen it in advance is to take a pretty long chance. It will pay to take a railroad trip if it is necessary to see the release, for such local suff must be boomed heavily and the disappointment is all the greater because it has been boomed. Don't take chances. Be sure in advance.

An Extra.

Now and then a New York exhibitor does wake up and send along something for this department. Leon Schlesinger, manager of the Central Picture Theater, sends in a dodger that was used to advertise the Sherlock Holmes stories. The house title is carried as a heading in imitation of a newspaper and a triple "Extra! Extra! Extra!" tops the page, the copy reading:

EXTRA! EXTRA! EXTRA!

THE FAMOUS DETECTIVE

SHERLOCK HOLMES CAPTURED!

By Special Arrangement with Sir A. Conan Doyle and The Union Feature Co., the Complete Series of Eight Famous Detective Stories Will Be Presented, One Each Day in Two Parts, in Conjunction with Our Usual Program, as Stated Here.

There follows a list of the eight reels and their days of display. The arrangement differs from the conventional handbill and forms an eye-catching display that will lead the recipient to read the remainder of the tpye. All of it is of a size to be easily grasped and there is none of the small reading lines that are out of place on a handbill. You can "get" the entire argument quickly and surely.

It just goes to show that there are live exhibitors in town, though one would not think so from the infrequency of their submissions. We hope that Mr. Schlesinger comes back and brings others with him.

Likes Good Slides.

Eller Metzger, of the Casino, Des Moines, Iowa, believes in something a little different including artistic slides instead of the crude home made stuff. He says:

> Your very excellent page is about the first thing I look for when I get THE WORLD every week, and I have been trying for some time to get to the point of writing, but you know how that is yourself. We have a slogan out here that reads "Des Moines Does Things" and I have been waiting in vain for any evidence to crop up in your department until I simply had to write and let you know we are not peacefully sojourning in the arms of Morpheus.
> I am interested in advertising and I believe many houses are overlooking a good many opportunities along these lines that could be cashed into big round dollars. I mean there are many ways to bring their features before the public in a way that would be a little different and would bring the public to their show.
> Just as an example, we had "The Message of the Rose" a while back and I had a dozen large red American Beauties made up of paper, about as large as a saucer, arranged them into a wreath, mounted upon a large white card with a beautiful air-brushed sign in the centre, giving the title and date. It brought the business and caused considerable comment that didn't do us any harm.
> For the "Tiger Lilly" I got two large tiger skins and draped them over the lithograph. This also brought in the business and helped to prove my theory that they want something different. There are many ways in which a picture can get publicity and I take my cues from their titles. I don't want to appropriate too much of your time, or I should mention more of them. However, I will enclose some of the copy I am using on slides. I never let a slide be shown on the screen that is not attractive as I believe these hand made slides, as the average man makes, are a detriment to your otherwise artistic show.
> Don't go to the mountains for pure air. We bring the mountains to you with the camera and supply the pure mountain air from a large ozone machine in the basement.
> The Casino Management will co-operate with the Public Library in supplying literature and further information on any historical, scenic or educational subjects shown here.
> Be methodical and devote a certain hour each day to relaxation, comfort and pleasure at the Casino—You will benefit thereby.
> Do you know that many prominent physicians come here every day to inhale the pure ozone air found exclusively at the Casino?
> When you miss a show at the Casino you are missing something worth while.—Why not see them all?
> Tell your friends about this show. They will appreciate it.
> The secret of our success is—We are careful what we hand our patrons.
> The Casino is the original and only pure air theater in Des Moines, the air you breathe is purified by an enormous ozone machine in the basement.
> These are all very artistically gotten up and I use about two of them once in every show, changing slides every few days.
> All my newspaper advertising carries this line
> CASINO
> The Pure Air Theater.

It is not always possible to get good slides made in a hurry, but it is possible to do better than some of the exhibitors try to. A little thought and a little painstaking care will improve the appearance even of the emergency slides. It is, as Mr. Metzger says, a blot on an otherwise artistic show to run a slide that suggests that it has been made by spilling an ink bottle on a sheet of glass.

Come and Freeze.

"Come and Freeze," is a catchy line for hot weather advertising. It is used by C. L. Purinton, of the Wonderland Theater, Turlock, California.

> I want to write to you to let you know there is such a place on the map, we don't see much in THE WORLD from California exhibitors but they are not all dead ones out here.
> I have been a partner in this house here for the past two years, and have had houses in other towns in California, and wherever I have been THE WORLD has been my Bible. I have bought out my partner here; change is to take place on September 1st, and am starting off with a program and would like to have your opinion of it. I intend covering Sunday, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, in the first issue and Thursday, Friday and Saturday in the second. It is my first attempt and intend to work it into a more pretentious affair later.
> We have an airdome adjoining the theater which is equipped with extra machine and piano, so in case it happens to be a little cool we can move it in two minutes. You will probably comment on the age of our service, but will say that it is making good here, the pictures are all new to our patrons, and are in fine shape. We don't have a break once in three weeks, and reels are free from grease and rain.

It is not always the smallest town that has the poorest printer. The sample program sent is a pretty piece of paper. It is cream yellow, printed in brown, twelve inches long and four and a half wide. The titles are cut into the text in a heavy twelve point, the body type being Roman in the same size. A light ornament breaks the three programs more effectively than a rule and we can find nothing to cavail at either in text or typographical treatment. It's one of those pieces of paper that you will like if you can appreciate good paper, and yet it probably cost no more money than some less effective offerings. It is not the money that counts but the brains that spends the money. If Mr. Purinton's paper is representative of the way he runs his house we hope that some time we can visit the theater. It would be worth while. Perhaps he'll tell us how he runs things.

Help Wanted.

E. R. Hardwick, of the Lyceum Theater, Clovis, N. M., is going to issue a weekly program and will appreciate it if other exhibitors will send him samples of theirs that he may frame his own offering intelligently. He will be glad to send his first issue in return for the courtesy.

Wants Programs.

A. M. Schuhman, owner of the Gem Theater, Pleasanton, Cal., wants to get out a weekly program and asks for samples. We have none. Perhaps some brother exhibitors will be kind enough to send some of theirs.

Kraus Offer Withdrawn.

EXHIBITORS will please take notice that the paragraph in this department Sept. 20, relative to the Kraus Manufacturing Company's prize post card scheme, has been withdrawn. We based our opinion of the legality of the scheme upon the opinion of one of the leading theatrical lawyers of the country, but the Post Office has advised the Kraus company that the scheme violates the lottery laws, and the scheme has been withdrawn. It would seem that the rulings on the lottery law are even more strict than was indicated in a recent letter from Hay and Nicholas, and exhibitors would do well to inquire very carefully into any prize or gift scheme no matter whether the distribution of prizes or gifts depends upon chance or meritorious work. The Post Office authorities are always glad to co-operate with any person in construing the law, and since scarcely any scheme may be properly advertised without the use of the mails either directly or through the newspapers, it would be well to first obtain a ruling on the particular scheme contemplated, particularly as the Post Office decision, being made with careful deliberation, will generally also cover the state and federal laws.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by Epes Winthrop Sargent

Answering Mr. Todd.

Stanley W. Todd, of the New York Inquest Club, propounds this question

> It is rather jarring to an ardent disciple of your teachings to have a different code of rules flatly prescribed to him by a well known writer who has just entered the photoplay field and is meeting some success therein. In this writer's opinion, the synopsis to a script is furnished only by people "who get $10 for their stories." He never condescends to be classed with the hoi polloi, sending stuff hit or miss to companies but having conceived an idea, visits a studio, interviews the director and prepares his script only on order or previous acceptance.
> I examined such a script, which ran 13 pages and read much like a fiction story. In no way was the action emphasized, but the motives, appearances of characters and suggestions for effective production were given in detail, in such a way as to leave it all up to the director. He had a leader for every scene, and the lengthy script carried no synopsis—this its author disdained as "taught only in motion picture journals."
> As this is a flagrant violation of the code of rules you have repeatedly urged, does it mean a new order of things in photoplay studios? If it is possible for one writer, is it not also in the province of every fairly successful script writer, living in New York City, where so many of the studios are located? Does it mean that there is a handicap for writers who are unable or never hope to be permitted to get in personal touch with a producer, director or an editor at any time?

We think that Mr. Todd knows what we think and that he propounds this question with an interest that is no more than academic. We think we know the writer Mr. Todd has in mind and if this surmise is correct we know, also, the reason he is able to get in touch with the editors and make personal submission of his ideas; a reason that is not connected in any manner with his ability as a playwrighter, but having to do with a wholly different phase of his work.

We do not think that he is making as much money nor giving as good results as Bannister Merwin, who has not been within three thousand miles of the Edison studio in nearly two years. The propounder of this proposition is an egotistical exception to the general and accepted rules and his views are of no value since they do not deal with average circumstances. A properly prepared script sent by mail is more likely to be accepted than the personally proffered product of a contented ass.

As an offset to this advice, we recently saw a book on the "protection" of the author, the protection consisting in sending in the synopsis only, with an offer to submit the script should the idea be found available. It was argued that the synopsis alone would not be regarded as worth stealing where the plot of action might be copied.

This would be excellent advice were it not that the idea and not the technical development is what the studio most desires and, granting the possibility of a theft, it would be the synopsis and not the plot of action that would be stolen.

Advice is worth no more than the knowledge and experience back of the utterance. It may sound all right—even better—than the utterance of the man who knows, but it won't work out.

The Lubin Script.

3 Interior Jewelry Store. Elaborate Set.
Acquiescent atmosphere and business of clerks and customers. Nell enters, asks clerk for certain kind of brooch. Clerk shows her tray full of brooches, but she can't find kind she wants. Asks to see the manager. Clerk exits off side and re-enters with Maurice. Clerk introduces Maurice to Nell and withdraws. Maurice invites Nell into private office. Exit Nell and Maurice off side.

4 Interior Private Office of Fielding & Son.
Maurice's father at desk up stage. Maurice enters with Nell, introduces her to father, pulls chair for Nell up to his desk. Nell explains she wants certain kind of brooch. Maurice goes off side and comes back with cards, each bearing different designs. Hands cards to Nell. She looks them over at some length, giving Maurice plenty of time to take in her charms. Maurice admiring Nell. Nell finally selects design and hands card to Maurice, tells him

Insert—"If you can get the brooch by to-morrow, send it to my hotel."

Maurice says he will do so. Nell takes card from pocketbook, writes on it and gives it to Maurice. Closing conversation. Nell smiles at Maurice dazzingly and exits. Maurice registers, "Gee, some swell chicken!"

5 Interior Room occupied by Watson and "Billy the Rat."
Watson and Billy conniving. Nell enters (but does not remove hat). Reports progress to Watson. Asks for money. Watson gives her roll of bills and says she's doing good work. More acquiescent business and Nell exits. Two crooks express satisfaction. In this scene it must be made apparent that Nell is not living in the same house with Watson and Billy.

5 Exterior Imposing Front of Hotel Van Alsten.
Taxi on. Footman helps Nell alight. Nell pays taxi-driver and exits into hotel.

7—Flash Interior Nell's Rooms in Hotel.
Door opens. Maid enters, holds door open for Nell, who enters. Maid exits, closing door. Nell proceeds to make herself at home.

8—(Same as 4)—Office of Jewelry Store.
Man brings brooch to Maurice. Maurice calls for salesman, examines brooch while waiting for salesman. Takes Nell's card—

Miss Eleanor Forrest

Hotel Van Alsten

(Cont. Scene.) Salesman enters. Maurice decides to deliver brooch himself, sends salesman away. Tells father he's going out, puts on hat, puts brooch in pocket and registers "I'm going to see a real queen," as he exits.

9—(Same as 7)—Nell's Room.
Nell in negligee, maid enters announcing Maurice. Nell arises to greet him as he enters. (Nell gives sly look aside.) Maurice delivers brooch. Nell apparently delighted with it. Pays him cash for it. After deal is closed, Maurice remains, half bashful, but wants to keep up conversation. He has "fallen" for Nell, and she adroitly leads on until he asks if she will go out with him to dinner that evening. (The invitation gets over in sub-title following this scene.) Nell apparently hesitates and appears shy. Maurice coaxes until she signifies consent. Maurice glad, takes out watch and registers appointment. Finally takes leave with smiling face. The maid who has remained in room during entire scene exits and closes door after Maurice. Nell laughs mockingly and goes to 'phone; calls number.

Leader—"He's going to take me out to dinner."

10—Flash—Watson's Room.
Watson at 'phone talking to Nell. Billy the Rat listening. Watson hangs up 'phone and tells Billy the news. Both express satisfaction.

Leader—That Evening.

11—Nell's Room.
Nell putting finishing touches to evening toilette, maid assisting, knock at door; maid opens and receives box of flowers for Nell. Nell examines flowers and card attached, laughs to herself, but doubtful shadow crosses her face. Maid goes to door again and admits Maurice in evening clothes. Greetings. Nell takes Maurice's arm and exits.

12—Exterior—Fashionable Restaurant. (Night effect.)
Auto on. Maurice and Nell alight and exit into cafe. Taxi on. Watson and Billy alight and exit into cafe.

13—Interior Fashionable Restaurant. Or use same set as Scene [illegible]
Nell and Maurice enter and are seated. Watson and Billy enter and sit near Nell and Maurice. Maurice orders dinner and leans over table talking lovingly to Nell. Watson and Billy watch proceedings with satisfaction.

Leader—Nell is beginning to really like Maurice.

14—Same as 13. Interior Restaurant.
Dinner finished. Maurice leaning over table talking lovingly to Nell. Nell's face bears new look. She is drinking in Maurice's words. They rise to go and Nell becomes conscious of the leers and winks from Watson and Billy. She is annoyed and shows it by frowning at them. them. She exits on Maurice's arm.

Leader—Sunday.

15—Flash—Country Road.
Maurice driving auto slowly across picture. Nell beside him. Laugh and talk merrily.

Leader—A different Sort of Man than Any Nell Has Known.

16—Spot in Woods, Log or Stump in Foreground. Road in background
Auto appears and stops in road. Maurice and Nell alight and walk slowly to foreground. Maurice sits Nell on log, leads up to love scene, takes ring from pocket and wants to put it on Nell's finger. Nell about to consent, but remembers what she is and pulls away—Shaking head—Maurice disappointed, puts ring back in pocket, but cheers up and tells Nell to think it over. It is evident that Nell cares very much for him and is worried. They rise to go. Get the idea of Nell's sacrifice in refusing Maurice over in this scene.

Leader—No Word from Nell for Two Days. The Crooks Grow Impatient.

17—Watson's Room.
Watson impatiently pacing floor, decides to call Nell on 'phone. Billy pulls him away from 'phone, tells him it's dangerous, better send note. Watson writes note.

Insert—Note:

"Nell:
You're falling down on the job. Come around tonight and we'll frame up something.
WATSON."

Insert ends scene.

Leader—New Dreams.

18—Nell's Room.
Nell enters just after outing with Maurice. Come slowly down front to chair. (Does not remove hat.) Sits and smiles teinderly, thinking of Maurice. Dissolve into

19—Garden or Porch. (Vision scene.)
Nell and Maurice (married) together—a couple of children playing around. Dissolve into

Nell's pleasant dream interrupted by entry of maid with note from Watson.

Insert—Flash Watson's note as in Scene 17.

Cont. scene. Nell, brought back to realization, is shocked, then angry; pulls herself together and exits.

Leader—Nell declares her intentions of leading an honest life.

Watson pacing floor. Billy reading paper. Nell enters, the two crooks ask why she hasn't made a haul, what's delaying her? She tells them she doesn't want to work a game on Maurice; they accuse her of being in love with Maurice and threaten her. Scene ends in a fuss and Nell exits, slamming door. Watson registers, "Well's, I'll be damned."

Leader—Tuesday.

22—Office of Jewelry Store.

Maurice and father busy; father opens letter; shows it to Maurice.

Insert—Typewritten letter:

FIELDING & SON
New York Jewelers Chicago

Chicago, Sept. 2, 1912.

Dear Mr. Fielding:
Wish you would rush that new lot of imported stock.
Can you get it here by Saturday?
Best wishes.

Mgr. Chicago Store.

(Cont. scene.) Maurice and father talk it over; father writes telegram.

Insert—Telegram:

John Collins, Mgr Fielding & Son, Chicago.
New stock will be shipped Thursday in charge of my son.
D. Fielding.

Leader—That evening Maurice tells Nell he is going to take some jewelry to Chicago.

23—Interior Restaurant.

Maurice and Nell at table. Maurice tells Nell as in leader. Watson and Billy or (Watson alone) behind palms or at next table overhear conversation, crafty look, etc. Nell sees Watson sneaking out, catches breath when she realizes that he has overheard Maurice's plans. Maurice asks her what's the matter but she recovers and says, "Nothing."

Leader—A threat.

24—Nell's Room.

Nell enters, followed by maid who points to note on table and withdraws. Nell reads note.

Insert—Note:

"Nell,
If you help us in one more deal we'll let you go your way. If you refuse we'll put your lover wise to your past. Come tonight.
Watson."

(Cont. scene.) Nell wonders what the game is. Don't want to go but is afraid Watson will carry out his threat. She exists.

Leader—By threat of exposure, Nell is compelled to be a party to the conspiracy.

25—Watson's Room.

Watson and Billy outlining plot to Nell, she refuses to help, but they threaten her, she realizes that they have the goods on her and wearily consents. Then Watson takes paper and draws diagram.

Insert Diagram—on piece of paper.

*New York · *Valley Springs *Chicago

Leader—Wednesday.

26—Flash—R. R. Station (Sign Conspicuous).

Train pulls in, Watson alights, looks around and walks off.

27—Interior Office Jewelry Store.

Maurice at desk, messenger brings note.

Insert—Note:

My dear Mr. Felding,
Have decided to go to Valley Springs for a few days rest. Your train makes a stop there, so we shall have a little ride together.
Eleanor Forrest.

28—Watson's Room.

Billy examining good sized trunk, shows Nell inside which is padded, also takes key and explains that trunk unlocks from inside or outside. Nell ready for traveling. Knock at door, Billy jumps into trunk and pulls down lid.

Trunk is labeled—E. F.—Valley Springs.

Nell opens door, enter expressmen, Nell indicates trunk, expressmen give Nell check for trunk and they carry trunk out. Nell out after him.

29—Interior. Baggage Room Window in New York R. R. Station.

Nell and Maurice on and check trunks at window. Nell is very nervous. Maurice asks what's the matter. Nell makes excuse she doesn't feel well. Maurice sympathetic. They exit.

30—Interior Pullman Car.

Partly filled with passengers. Nell and Maurice enter, porter seats them in chairs next each other.

31—Interior Baggage Car. (Glimpses of station outside.)

Baggage man receiving trunks through side door. Nell's trunk is handed in, he puts it on far side of door. Maurice's trunk (suitably marked) comes in, puts it near side of door.

32—In the Pullman.

Nell nervous. Maurice trying to cheer her up, gets box of candy from his bag, both look out of window. Register that train has started.

33—In the Baggage Car.

Baggage man closes door and begins sorting tags, etc.

35—In the Pullman.

Nell and Maurice. Nell nervous, etc.

36—Exterior.

Railroad in open country. Train going away from camera.

37—In the Baggage Car.

Baggage man tagging trunks.

Trunk opens slowly, Billy's head appears, looks cautiously around, begins to climb out of trunk.

(Cont. scene.) Baggage man at work, Billy climbing out of trunk up stage, baggage man turns and sees him, pulls gun, both fire together, both miss and dodge behind trunks. (Baggage man down near camera exchange of shots.)

Inquiries.

NOTE—No questions can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. A list of addresses to which photoplays may be sent will be mailed on receipt of a STAMPED AND ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of a script.

A. W.—Mme Bernhardt does not regularly play for any film company. She has appeared in "Camille," "Queen Elizabeth," and a couple of other productions, but under special contract. We have no means of knowing when any particular film will be shown in Los Angeles.

M. G.—Manufacturers generally prefer to make their own arrangement of standard poems and stories. There is nothing to prevent you from making adaptations of uncopyrighted stories, but in the case of copyrighted matter (and copyright may have been renewed on a story apparently no longer protected), may be made only by arrangement with the holder of the copyright.

W. S.—It must be that in the exigencies of make up the reply to your question was taken from the form and not replaced in the hold-over galley. It was replied to some time ago. Edison is still at the Bedford Park address. The company requires longer time than most to pass on a script. Do not query them within eight weeks. The script is perfectly safe. The romance you mention is not likely to appeal particularly to any company, but you might try Edison, Vitagraph and American on the off chance.

A. P.—The cast of characters is scarcely necessary when sending a synopsis to Keystone. The cast will be made when the story is developed into action.

H. C.—There is not one chance in a million that an untrained girl can get a job as a picture actress. The supply is vastly in excess of the demand.

J. B.—Supplementing the reply of a couple of weeks ago the K. B. player is Alfred Vosburg.

S. T.—The Answers Man regrets that he cannot give the names of "several" plays in which Ray Myers has recently appeared, for this excellent actor has been seen only once of late, the Majestic, for a late August date.

B. M.—Just so. Technique teaches that it is unwise to ridicule marked physical infirmaties. You see a St. Vitus dance comedy and do not like it. The point is proved. The trounble is that some producers do not know their business. We are glad to say that such manifestations of brutal instincts are comparatively rare, but they should not be permitted at all.

M. F.—Double exposures would require too much space for an extended explanation. Generally they are one of three classes. In each class the film is twice passed through the camera. In one form the diaphragm is opened or closed, producing a dissolve. In another, only one part of the film is exposed each time, producing visions, or the second time, one or more players are posed against a black cloth or "box" giving more or less spectral effects. If you are interested ask at the Public Library for "Talbot's How Motion Pictures are Made and Worked." The Answers Man positively refuses to accept your suggestion that he is "a little off."

J. A.—Miss Dollie Larkin was Dollie in "A Romance of the Ozarks." The casts of the other plays are not available.

V. O. W.—A stamped and addressed return envelope will bring you the desired information.

C. J. S.—Almost any company will produce the play if the story is worth while.

H. A. D.—The cost of "cutting in" leaders is so little in excess of straight joining that the additional cost does not figure. If you have a good story, the matter of leaders can be fixed up by the editor. We do not recommend sending scripts to other than the companies having a direct and regular outlet for its product through one of the releasing combinations. Most of the specials are not in the market. Too bad about the marked scripts.

M. M. M.—Miss Ethel Phillips and Tom Moore were Margaret and John Coates in "For Her Sister's Sake." Miss Carlotta de Felice was Anita in "The Clown and the Prima Donna." Tom Moore had the name part in "The Christian."

G. B. M.—We do not think the post cards you want are in print. Query the press department of the Universal.

Mrs. T.—Have to pass up those Majestics. Sorry. Ralph Lewis was the Reliance player. We do not know the brand Mr. Kerrigan will play with, something was said about the Rex.

Off the "Tall Stump."

HAVING given a great deal of thought and consideration to the matter of the questions, I have finally concluded that hundreds of excellent and valuable ones may be asked without doing any harm, or coaching operators in such a way as to enable them to pass an examination by learning the answers to a lot of questions by heart. I have, therefore, decided to ask one question each week, and to publish the best reply received thereto—that is to say, I will try this scheme and see how it works. If the thing becomes too strenuous, why I will have to adopt some other plan, but I guess we can get by with it all right. The name of the party sending in the reply which we publish will be given, so that the operator will get credit for his knowledge. Also the names of others sending in correct replies will be published in a Roll of Honor. I shall try to make these questions of such a character that in order to answer them fully and correctly one will have to either possess real knowledge of the subject, or else will have to dig around and acquire that knowledge, and that is exactly what I want to force, or induce operators to do, for therein lies the value of these questions. And now, without taking further time in discussion, we ask.

Question No. 1.

> Explain in detail what a field rheostat of a generator or motor consists of. What it is for and how it acts. By "how it acts," I mean that you are to explain what electrical change takes place, and how it takes place, when you move the lever of a field rheostat of the motor or generator.

Now, let me give you a hint. There are literally thousands of you who cannot give a complete and intelligent answer to this question, because you do not know, yet you may be called to handle a motor generator set at any time, since their use in operating rooms is becoming more and more common. How then are you going to answer this question? I will tell you. Go to your public library and look up and study such matters in standard text books. Then go to one of the electricians at your power house, or to any good electrician, and ask him to explain these matters to you. Use your brains and your ingenuity, and learn these things, so that you can answer this question by reason of the fact that you possess knowledge of field rheostats and their action. That is the idea. I do not want you to answer these questions unless you know what you are talking about, and believe me I can detect an answer that is taken out of a book, and it won't count.

Local Union 306.

Local Union 306, of New York City, is making progress. It is building up as fast as it ought. A too rapid growth is seldom or never the best thing for any organization. The white pine tree grows rapidly, but it is easily killed. The mahogany grows slowly, but it withstands the most terrific gale that ever blew, with scarcely any damage at all. Personally, I would rather see the New York operators spend five years in organizing, and at the end of that time have a solid, substantial, powerful union, than to see the city organized in two or three months and the organization be nothing but a great big sponge, which would shrink at the first breath of trouble as fast as it expanded.

There is an old adage which reads: "There is no excellence without great labor," and both time and great labor are required in the building up of a really strong, substantial labor union. This is particularly true in the city of New York, where the men are scattered in the Bronx, Queens, Brooklyn, Manhattan, Staten Island and Coney Island, the extremes being many miles apart. Personally, I believe that eventually there will have to be some scheme of district organization adopted. I proposed this plan to the old Auxiliary, but it was considered at that time to be impractical.

The one thing needed, above all others, in this city, is a re-examination of all operators. There are altogether too many men who secured licenses when licenses were comparatively very easy to get, and who could no more pass the examination of today, than they could sprout wings and fly to heaven. They knew very little then, and have acquired practically no knowledge since. They are not really capable of operating a moving picture machine, if capability be construed as meaning the production of high-class results on the screen. By this, I mean they know nothing whatever of the finer points in the art of projection. True, they can mend a film, after a fashion, handle their light, after a fashion, and run their machine, after a fashion, but that is right where the trouble lies; it is all "after a fashion," and nothing is done perfectly. They won't study, or try to learn, but, believe me, there certainly would be one huge excitement if it were announced that there would be a general re-examination, and that those failing to pass would lose their licenses. I can imagine the sputter there would be, and that is exactly what is needed in this city. Some of the self-satisfied incompetents would get a shaking-up that would last them for a long time to come, and projection in New York would take on an impetus that would astonish the managers. Nor is this proposition by any means unlikely to take place. It is receiving attention by the powers that be, and may take place at any time. Therefore, some of you wise ones had better wake up for, "The examiner 'll git you, if you don't watch out."

Meanwhile, however, as I said in the beginning, Local Union 306 is making very satisfactory progress and I trust that this progress will continue, and that the union will grow into an efficient and powerful factor in the amusement life of the city. I again say to competent New York operators that they should make application to Local Union 306 without delay. It is $5.00 now, but it will be three times that sum before long, and that is no bluff either. The reduction to $5.00 is only temporary, and will last but sixty days unless renewed, which I understand is not likely to be the case.

A Suggestion.

Fort Worth, Texas, writes as follows:

> I would like to see you give up about ten inches of space in the department once a month to illumination and photometry, dealing with the following subjects: Type of lamps from a two-candle-power to the mercury vapor light; plan of illumination and calculation of illumination; arrangement of lamps, shades and reflectors; number of square feet lighted per lamp, or globe of a given candle-power; number of globes used for given space, circuits, cycles; power factor of lamps, watts per square feet; watts consumed; efficiency of lamps; mean intensity in Hefner units; intensity, mean watts and mean candle power. If an arc lamp, or light, was burning, or consuming 40 amperes of d. c., what would be the candle power of 55 volts at the arc? Is the following answer correct? 55 v = E amperes = C. In the geometrical fraction it is E x C x W per c. p. = c. p., or, using figures, 55 x 40 amperes = 2,200 watts, which, multiplied by 3.5, = 7,700 candle power, approximately, for d. c., and for a. c. at 40 amperes and 35 volts at the arc it is as follows: Since a. c. alternates between zero and 240 it lessens the candle power a little more than ¼, or 2.5; thus: 40 amperes multiplied by 35 volts = 1,400 watts x 2.5 = 3,500 candle power through resistance. With the mercury arc it is 40 x 51 = 2,040 x 2.95 = 6,018 c. p. Of course, this is only approximate, and that is why I would like you to take up photometry. I have studied some and would like to know more.

Well, Fort Worth, I do not regard figures of that kind, when applied to a projection arc-lamp, as having any considerable value, nor would I know how to go about proving, or disproving, the correctness of your ciphering. You may or may not be right. I do believe, however, that some space might be used, with profit, in the matter of auditorium illumination. More knowledge on that subject would not do any of us any harm. However, if there is any considerable number of operators who wish to dig into this matter of candle power of arc lamps, I will see what I can discover. The reason I say I do not think it is of any considerable value, is that any conclusion you might work out, which would be correct in one instance, would be incorrect in another where a different brand, grade, or size carbons were used, or where the contacts were not kept as they should be; also, there is a very considerable difference in the quantity of current generated by different dynamos, and I believe this to some extent affects the illuminating power, too. But, after all, supposing you do know the exact candle power of your arc lamp, of what particular benefit is it going to be to you as an operator? If you can show me where there will be any improvement in projection through the acquisition of this kind of knowledge, I will be more than glad to take the matter up, although it involves a large amount of study, and a tremendous amount of experiment. I believe such questions as these might be of some practical value several years hence, but we have so many things to learn now, any one of which takes precedence over photometry in point of practical improvement, that I hardly feel justified in yielding to your request. If an operator is not getting sufficient candle power at his arc he can see it plainly enough without bothering to figure it out on paper.

Wants To Learn.

Mr. Soren Christensen, Detroit, Michigan, wants to know if there is any way he can learn to be a moving picture operator. He is willing to pay if there is any way of doing this.

The only practical method is to arrange to serve an apprenticeship under some proficient operator. I would advise Brother Christensen to talk with some of the Detroit operators and see if he can arrange to be taken on as helper and apprentice.

Back Number Worlds For Sale.

Mr. F. G. Wheeler, 36 Prescott Street, Lowell, Massachusetts, will accept the best offer made for a complete file of back numbers of THE WORLD, from October 15, 1910, to date. Intending purchasers may communicate with Mr. Wheeler direct.

I Told You So.

On page 959, August 30th issue, is a letter from Mr. W. A. Clay, owner of the "It" Theater, Ogden, Utah, which reads as follows:

> For Heaven's sake, avail yourself of the enclosed $2.50 and send us a handbook. The Department has devoted much space to the advertising of that book for a year. One is obliged to believe that an operator cannot keep house without it.

To which I replied at some length, and, in the course of that reply, said that we had received many enthusiastic letters of commendation and that I thought his (Mr. Clay's) would probably be added to the list. He now writes:

> I note in August 30th issue, that you take exception to the wording of the handbook order sent in by myself. Have had the book some two weeks now, and under the circumstances would have enjoyed finding something to have justified the disagreeable comment, but, to do justice to the facts, I must admit that the handbook is apparently most complete and comprehensive in every department of the exhibitors' and operators' end of the moving picture industry; yet it is compact in its makeup. Furthermore, I will say that we have already taken advantage of information contained in the book to the value of several times the $2.50 it cost us. As I have no desire to "dash off" a superior article in handbooks, I hereby cordially tender you my full permission to advertise your own work to your heart's content.

Well, I reckon that will help some, anyhow. I said my little say before, and have very little to add to it now. I want to see that book in the hands of every manager and operator in the United States, not, as many may imagine, from a purely selfish point of view, but because it is needed. If unions would take steps to compel their members to inform themselves on such subjects and study their business, some of the large-city locals would not be so badly scared of the non-union man. My compliments to you, Brother Clay.

Tulsa, Oklahoma, Retaliates.

Mr. E. A. Inman, chief operator of Palace Theaters, Tulsa, Oklahoma, writes:

> In the August 30th issue, I note our city has been handed a very nice, little package concerning our alleged poor projection. I would like you to correct this in your next issue. We have a good bunch of operators, who have been here for a long time, and who are capable of holding down their jobs. The man who wrote that is a stranger who came in and failed to land a good position. He is now working in a negro show at about $8.00 per week. I know this to be a fact, as I have investigated it personally. All our men are getting good results. We run four reels of pictures at all motion picture houses, instead of trying to run four reels and four acts in an hour, which you know would be an impossibility. The vaudeville houses run two reels and four acts in about one and a half hours, or according to the length of the acts. The managers, sometimes, when the houses are crowded, cut the show by taking off a reel, but the films are never run fast enough to seriously affect the production. We have one of the best show towns in the country, and all our houses are well patronized. There are two new vaudeville theaters going in at the present time, so you see the business has not been greatly injured either by poor management, or poor projection.

If the man in question really wrote the letter in a spirit of revenge, because he did not get a job, then it was a reprehensible thing to do. However, he exonerated the operators from any blame for any poor projection there might be. I publish letters of that kind sometimes because, as I look at it, if an injustice has been done it can be rectified, and if there really is a lax state of affairs, the publication is very likely to act as a prod to stir things up, and improve conditions, at least to some extent.

Two Questions.

Brooklyn, New York, propounds the following:

> (a) How are the two dynamos connected in the three-wire system in a.c. and d.c.? Does it require a larger wire for the neutral than for the outside wires when using a.c.? (b) Does usage reduce the carrying capacity of wire?

(a) One outside wire is connected to the negative brush of one dynamo. The other outside wire is connected to the positive brush of the other dynamo, and the positive brush of the first machine and the negative of the second machine are connected direct to the neutral. This holds good with d.c. but with a.c. the generators are not connected directly to the lines. There are two transformers intervening. One outside wire is connected to one end of one secondary coil and the other outside wire is connected to one end of the other secondary coil. The other ends of these coils are then joined to the neutral, which need be no larger than the outside wires.

(b) Not unless the carrying capacity of the wire is exceeded, causing it to heat to a considerable extent. High temperature changes the nature of the metal and increases its resistance. If the wire is kept within its normal current capacity, so far as I know there is no deterioration in current capacity, though that might not be strictly true if you have in mind a long period of time—say five or ten years. I am not very well posted on this particular point, and would ask some of our department fans to express their views.

Supply Dealers.

The Erker Brothers Optical Company, 604 Olive Street, St. Louis, Missouri, whose advertisement appears elsewhere, have sent in a copy of a very complete catalog of motion picture supplies, which operators or exhibitors can have for the asking. The catalog contains forty-eight pages, and there is a supplementary and very complete illustrated catalog of announcement and advertising slides, which will be of particular interest to both exhibitors and operators. A postal card request will bring both books.

A Deep, Dense Mystery.

Ohio has run into a deep, dark, dense, deadly mystery. The "juice" has vanished; just climbed up a pole and jumped off into limitless space, as it were, and Ohio is unable to bring it back, and make it behave itself. He writes:

> Suppose I have an engine and a generator connected with 116 c. p. incandescent 110-volt lamps. When they are all burning my ammeter registers 50 amperes, or ½ ampere to each lamp. Now, if I turn 50 of them off, in a short time my ammeter registers approximately 25 amperes, though the engine and generator are going at the same rate of speed as in the first place, and are, therefore, generating the same amount of juice. Now, what I cannot understand, is where do those 25 amperes of current go when half the lights are turned out. Does it go away into the ground, or where does it disappear?

I think you guessed it, Ohio. You look around under your generator and you will probably find that some naughty rat has dug a hole and the juice is leaking into the same. Possibly Mr. Rat has an apartment down under the ground somewhere and is lighting it up at your expense. Seriously, however, I think you had better study up on electrical matters. Your generator produces a steady potential of 110 volts. Each one of your lamps has a resistance calculated to allow 110 volts to force practically ½ ampere through its filament. If that lamp is shut off there is not any amperage going through, and the generator is not putting out that ½ ampere. You could shut off all your lamps and the generator would still be generating 110 volts potential, but no amperage at all, though there will be amperage flowing the instant you turn on the lamps. To make the matter more plain, look at drawing on page 23 of the handbook. The water level in the tank represents the potential, and the water flowing out represents the amperage. If you close all valves in the pipes, the pressure will still be there, but no water will be flowing. If you open one or more of the pipes, the water will instantly begin to flow, and will continue to flow with undiminished force, as long as the pump maintains the level of water in the tank.

Guil Pastiles.

Jamestown, North Dakota, wants to know where he can buy Guil Pastiles. After considerable search, I re-discovered the address and supplied it to two or three inquirers. They now report that they wrote the man, and got no reply—and there you are.

Guil Pastile Again.

Mr. Walter H. Stephens, Nicholson, Pennsylvania, wants to know the address of the importer of the Guil Pastile. Brother Stephens is referred to my reply to Jamestown, above.

D. C. to D. C. Economizer.

Brooklyn, New York, informs me that about the middle of September he will open a new photoplay theater on Marcy Avenue, Brooklyn, and extends a cordial invitation to the editor to inspect the same at any time. He winds up with the following:

> I will use 110 volt d. c. and, while it is more desirable for motion picture projection than a. c., I understand that it is more expensive by reason of the fact that there are no efficient means of transforming it to arc voltage. What I wish to be advised upon is, if I use 220 a. c. with a transformer, or any apparatus that would economize current, and at the same time succeed in getting a good light, will I save any money by so doing as against using d. c.?

In the first place, if you use a. c. through a transformer you will have to use a very much higher amperage to get a result on the screen equal to that of d. c. We now have d. c. to d. c. econmoizers, which transform line voltage to arc voltage with an efficiency of approximately 66⅔ per cent. In other words, there will be something like ⅓ waste in the process, but when you come to consider the difference in effect on the screen, I am of the opinion that, while there would be some financial advantage in the use of a. c., still, at the same time, I would not, in a house of my own, consider that saving as sufficient to justify the use of alternating current for projection. It takes almost double the a. c. amperage to give d. c. effects. Of course, on the other hand, when the voltage is reduced through transformers the amperage is increased almost in proportion, so that the loss of approximately ⅓ in the d. c. machine still remains against it.

Arizona Location Wanted.

Mr. E. J. Myrick, Fort Steilacoom, Washington, sends order for handbook, and writes:

> I am not very active at present, but expect to be back in the business before long. Was located at Missoula, Montana, for about four years, and I will take off my hat to the operators of that city. I claim we had the best projection in the Northwest. I will be glad to hear from some of the Arizona boys with regard to a good location. And now for a scheme. If I move, and undertake to carry along the load of Moving Picture World's I have, and which I really do not see how I can get along without, I will have to pay a lot of excess. I have solved that puzzle in this way, and would like to pass the suggestion along. I have removed the pages pertaining to projection and have filed them, numbering each issue, and indexing each number. I find it a very simple and valuable method of keeping track of "what is going on."

If any of the Arizona boys know of a location, let them stand forth and be heard, but I am afraid Arizona is just like every place; there is a bunch of men right there on the ground looking for those "good locations." It is rather regrettable that you destroyed your files. You may feel the need of them some time. You could have sent them all by freight at no great expense.

Amputate Edison Crank—Some of It.

Reading, Pennsylvania, makes the following suggestion:

> My transformer makes a terrible noise, something like an automobile going up hill at sixty miles an hour. I have a handbook, which I find very convenient when trouble brews. It is the best friend of the operator, and I keep one always within reach. Have only been running a machine since 1911, and am deaf to boot, but I believe I can put results on the screen equal to any other operator who is minus his hearing. I worked out a scheme on Edison model type B as follows: When the machine loses its lower loop one cannot open the lower fire guard to reset it, but instead, is compelled to stop the machine. I have cut 2½ inches off the crank of my machine and now I can reset the loop without stopping; also, I find the shorter crank is much easier on the arm.

I am afraid you will have to take that transformer matter up with the manufacturer, though, if your operating room is lined with sheet metal and the transformer is closer than two feet to the same it is possible that the noise comes from the iron lining of the room, in which vibration is set up by the action of the magnetic field surrounding the core of the transformer. Never locate the transformer closer than two or three feet to any sheet metal. With regard to the ghost you speak of, either your condenser lenses are not right, or else your lamp house is too far ahead or back. As to the Edison crank, I, myself, have never understood why the Edison Company puts such a long crank on its machine. When I first operated an Edison the first thing I did was to have a shorter crank made, which I installed in place of the regular one, and found it, to my way of thinking, much better. I do not remember how much shorter I made it, but I think a couple of inches.

Never Again.

Mr. Stanley Faulkner writes from Rochester, Ind., as follows:

> I suppose it makes you feel good to hear from an old road man once in a while. I managed to break away from the road grind three months ago, and it would take a locomotive to drag me back. The house where I am putting the silent players on the screen seats 310. Equipment is Power's 6A motor drive projector, using 110 volt, 60 cycle current through a Fort Wayne compensarc; 81-foot throw on a mirror screen, with a two-blade shutter on the projector. The operating room is ten feet by seven feet by seven feet high, with a twelve-inch vent and two twelve and one twenty-four inch opening to the open air. I hold a card in Local 194 in Indianapolis, Ind., and projection is set at a high standard in that city. It is hard to beat them. I recently ran eight three-reel shows on one trim of carbons on my 6A, which is some run.

It is some run all right, provided you are using much current. However, inasmuch as you have a mirror screen you are probably not projecting a large picture, and I suppose your amperage is moderate. Yes, I like to hear from road men, and I like to hear from the other boys, too. But, best of all, I like to receive reports of good projection such as you speak of in Indianapolis. The union having a membership putting out that kind of work need not have any very large fear of the competition of the would-be.

Machine Trouble.

Marianna, Ark., sets forth his trouble as follows:

> Am running a Power's 6 and am getting along very well, with the exception of a little jump in the picture which I have not been able to eliminate. Should there be any play in the intermittent sprocket when the film is moving? I have a little play, but when I try to tighten it the whole thing binds. Have tried everything I know without result. Have been operating for four years, but only three weeks with a Power's. I do not belong to the union, but if I ever have the chance I certainly will. I am forty miles from the nearest local. We have two theaters in Marianna, one seating 265 and the other 360. How long is the average life of the intermittent sprocket, aperture plate, and the tension spring?

In the first place, brother, you have not described that jump sufficiently well for me to offer you intelligent advice. Simply to say that you "have a jump" might mean any one of two or three things wrong. Be sure that the face of your intermittent sprocket is perfectly clean and that it has no end play; be sure the tension springs are exerting sufficient pressure, and that the upper gate rollers hug the film reasonably close. If all those things are as they should be, then there is probably something wrong with your intermittent sprocket, or its shaft, or the boxing in which the shaft runs; but most likely it is in the sprocket itself. Describe the jump more clearly and I will try and diagnose your case. As to the life of the various machine parts, there is no rule which can be given; it depends on too many things. The life of the aperture plate will depend upon how tight you keep your tension springs set, and the same is true of the tension springs. No estimate for sprockets can be given, though the tightness of the tension springs has a lot to do with that, since the tighter they are the greater the force which must be exerted by the sprocket wheel in pulling the film down. A great deal depends also on what speed the projector is run; if it is overspeeded the life of these parts will be comparatively short. Yes, Power's Six intermittent sprocket has play when the geneva is off the lock—the film being moved.

Address Wanted.

Mount Vernon, Wash., wants to know the address of the manufacturer of the Shipman Rewinder. I do not, myself, remember the desired address, but I think Mr. J. H. Hallberg, 36 East 23rd Street, New York City, can supply you with the article.

An Explanation.

Mr. W. P. Glenn, assistant business agent of Local 236, Birmingham, Ala., says:

> I read an article in the Department recently by Mr. W. D. Sullings, chief operator of the Delite Theater, New Decatur, Ala., in which he said something about an operator trying to oust an operator in New Decatur by offering to take his position for less money. I am assistant business agent of Local 236 and would like to explain this matter, both to him and to the public. On the first day of July, we submitted contracts to the managers in Birmingham, Bessemer, and Ensley, asking an increase in wages. The operator referred to was working at a negro picture show in Birmingham at that time. All the managers of white shows signed the contract, but the colored show managers refused. We were, therefore, obliged to call the operators out of the colored theaters, and all came out but two, he being one of the two who remained at work. He was fined $100 and suspended for one year. He also owes the local for a loan and several other small debts, in all amounting to about $125. He is not now a member of our local. All this is related with view to showing Mr. Sullings his error in condemning fifty men, in a body, because one who used to be a member has done wrong. I would suggest to Mr. Sullings the advisability of finding out the one man's standing before making a kick that will hurt the other forty-nine. Projection is good in Bessemer (Bessemer is a suburb of Birmingham. Ed.), though there are only two theaters here. I am chief operator at the Princess, using two Power's 6A machines, taking 110 volts a. c. through a Fort Wayne compensarc, with a 53-foot throw. We use 60 amperes and the picture is as clear as crystal. We receive much valuable help through the Projection Department, and I wish both yourself and the paper many years of prosperity.

All of which requires little comment. I believe I told Brother Sullings that he ought not to condemn a whole body of men on account of the shortcomings of one of its number. It is a good plan, as Brother Glenn suggests, to find out the facts before giving voice to a sweeping condemnation. However, in this kind of a case we must consider the fact that Brother Sullings doubtless did not know how to go about finding out whether the man belonged to the union or not, since he did not have the address of the Birmingham secretary.

Not Guilty.

Mr. James Chambless, formerly of Indianapolis, Ind., manufacturer of a motor drive device recently described in this department, writes as follows, from Birmingham, Ala., in which State he now seems to be located.

> I wish to comment on an article headed, "From Alabama," issue of August 23rd. The tone of this letter might lead the public to believe the condition described to be general in Alabama and throughout the South, where managers are employing 10-year-old boys for operators. As for the Birmingham district, I want to say that machines are operated by union men—yes, real men—and there are some just as level-headed gentlemen in the moving picture game in this district as I have met elsewhere. As a rule, Birmingham managers treat their operators with courtesy, and a lot better than some I know of in other districts. However, even supposing some Alabama managers do employ 10-year-old kids, it does not follow that this is the only city where that is done. I am just above the Dixie line myself and am pretty well acquainted with conditions. Managers around here have begun to place motor drives on their machines, realizing it is a labor and money saving proposition. We have some real first class moving picture theaters in this district, with real, brainy, courteous managers to handle them, and real human being operators in charge of the projection; also there are two operators and two machines in each theater—not one operator and a boy. They are all members of Local 236, I. A. T. S. E., thank you. The members of 236 and their families had a private picnic recently, and believe me, we had some time. The managers here give us the goods to deliver and we deliver them.

No, friend Chambless, I do not think the writer of the article in question intended to convey the idea that all Alabama operators and managers were in the class named. As a matter of fact, I do not suppose Alabama is any worse in that respect than many other States, and I am indeed pleased to have this excellent report from your city. I publish letters such as the one you speak of, not with any idea of knocking any particular section of the country, but simply to give such matters publicity, because not only is the employment of cheap, inefficient operators, and the employment of 10 and 15 year old kids as operators, very bad for the business as a whole, but it is also in a way a swindle on the public, who pay their money to see a moving picture show, not a weird, proposterous combination of jumps and shadows.

Operators Are you perfectly satisfied with the results you get on the screen?

"JOHN TOBIN'S SWEETHEART" (Vitagraph), September 19. A very pleasing character comedy, with Hughey Mack, Flora Finch and John Bunny in the leading roles. Hughey is a sailor, in love with Flora. He is cast up on an island, captured by the natives and forced to marry the princess. The scenes on this tropical island were especially good, though rather wanting in action. Flora waits ten years for her lover, and then marries Bunny, mistaking him for Hughey. The photography is excellent and as a comedy this is successful.

"DR. TURNER TURNS THE TABLES" (Patheplay), September 19.—An old plot containing a very funny situation toward the close. The fore part of the picture was vague in its development and could have been shortened considerably and given more play to the main complication. The young doctor entertains a theatrical troupe during his friend's absence, and on his return all pretend to be the doctor's patients.

"HARNESSED FALLS OF THE NORTHWEST" (Patheplay), September 19.—Showing some of the great waterfalls of the Northwest and some suspension bridges across streams and gorges. The scenic effects are tremendous. On same reel with above.

"THE BURGLAR AND THE BABY" (Kalem), September 19.—The good-hearted husband loves to play with his child, but his wife accuses him of laziness and drives him out of the house. He becomes a burglar, but there is a baby in the first house he robs and he stops to play with it, the result being that he and his pals are arrested. Quite amusing.

"THE ONE BEST BET" (Kalem), September 19.—An entertaining skit, on same reel with above, in which John Brennan appears as the young husband. His wife sends the clothes containing his week's pay to the tailor. The recovery of the money furnishes the excitement. A brisk and pleasing half reel.

"THE REJECTED LOVER'S LUCK" (Selig), September 19.—This Western number relies chiefly upon its splendid scenic effects and excellent photography to interest the observer. The story is very conventional. It tells of the brother who went West, strikes gold and returns to marry his brother's widow, who had once rejected him. The plot is not fresh enough to get up a very strong interest.

"THE LOVE OF BEAUTY" (Lubin), September 19.—This is quite a familiar situation, worked out unusually well in this instance. The young blind man is loved by a homely girl. He is a great lover of beauty and when he regains his sight she fears to have him see her. Indeed, when he does get sight of her his actions were far from heroic, as he fairly runs from her presence. Later, however, he learns to love her for herself alone. There are some good interior photographic effects in this and the acting is sincere and effective for the most part.

"THE GREAT PHYSICIAN" (Edison), September 20.—A symbolic drama, written by Bannister Merwin. The action centers about the bed of a dying child. Charles Ogle appears, in shadow photography, as the Great Physician, Death and the Shepherd. These illusions impress some observers, but in the main we think the story succeeds because of its real pathos, brought out by the passing away of the lame child and the grief of its mother. Mabel Trunnelle was effective in the part of the mother.

"HER PRESENT" (Lubin), September 20.—The girl agrees to marry the one of her four admirers who brings her the best present. The last one succeeds by bringing her a safety pin when she is taking a dip in the ocean. Very fair light comedy.

"HIS REWARD" (Lubin), September 20.—This, on same reel with above, is a sprightly little comedy. Auntie has a habbit of pretending to drown. The hero saves her once, but as she wants to marry him as a reward, he refuses to go after her a second time. A pleasing idea in this.

"THE REDEEMED CLAIM" (Essanay), September 20.—This number features G. M. Anderson as a young assayer. He discovers that the land belonging to his girl's father contains a valuable mining claim. After an exciting ride he brings money to pay off the note against her father. This Western offering is handled very well and gets up a legitimate interest, though the story is of course not very new. The climax was exciting.

"HER BRAVE RESCUER" (Patheplay), September 20.—An unusually attractive Western release from a photographic standpoint. The young married woman, impersonated by Lillian Wiggins, visits a ranch. The Mexican, Mendoza, saves her life in a runaway, and this brings on jealousy on the part of his wife. In place of the usual tragedy at the close of such situations the observer is treated to some good comedy, in which all the participants are ducked in a pond. As stated, the photography is especially good and the release as a whole very pleasing.

"FOR THE SON OF THE HOUSE" (Biograph), September 20.—This film story possesses quite a strong interest, the action centering about a poor girl discharged from a sweatshop because she will not listen to the advances of the superintendent. She is taken into the home of a wealthy woman and here saves the weak son from disgracing himself by stealing the family jewels. These interior scenes were well handled, both the girl and the son doing nice work in their parts. Not a powerful story, but an entertaining one.

"THE BREATH OF SCANDAL" (Kalem), September 20.—This film develops an interesting situation, wherein a young school teacher takes the child of a despondent mother about to commit suicide. The teacher comes in for much condemnation from the village gossips, but in the end she is cleared. The son of a wealthy family is found to be responsible for the child and he marries the young mother. Not an essentially new plot, but strongly handled and with good characterizations.

"TOBIAS WINS OUT" (Selig), September 17—A very acceptable comic offering that made more laughter than any other picture today. It fills a whole reel, but it isn't an inch too long and amuses all the way. The best of it is that there is much truth in it and much simple human nature. Tobias is a soldiering soldier and he wants his discharge. First he gets paralysis of the legs; then he grows deaf, and, at last, becomes insane; but the doctor is too sharp to be taken in and manages each time to find some way to show him up. We laugh at Tobias, but we also sympathize with him. It is a well made picture and a good offering.

"THE HINDOO CHARM" (Vitagraph), September 17.—A picture taken in the Orient by the travelers. It is likely to be popular, for there is much good in it—the situation is fresh and has a punch. Maurice Costello plays an English official in India who, to get a mother for his two little girls, marries again (Clara Kimball Young plays the new wife). The stepmother neglects the children. She had awakened the resentment of a fakir, played perfectly by James Young, and this "devil priest" makes gruesome use of the children's longing for the love of their new mother—he tells the youngest of them to put some liquid he gives her into tea to make her love them and it is done. The children keep the picture from being wholly convincing, and Mr. Costello, in running, after the catastrophy skips as though he were glad, but this is not logical. It is well staged. Eugene Mullen is the author and Maurice Costello produced it.

"CORNWALL, THE ENGLISH RIVIERA" (Edison), September 17.—Artistic glimpses of a rocky coast and of quaint, seaside villages. There are some good views of billows breaking on the rough shore. As giving us the local color and background of old English stories, ballads and the like, these offerings are of high value. The photography is clear and satisfactory. Charles Brabin produced it.

"THE COMEDIAN'S DOWNFALL" (Edison), September 17.—A very good comic offering that tickled the audience and is likely to amuse everywhere. Maurice Lewis is the author. He doesn't make fun of "Votes for Women"; but of an accentuated individual militant. Dan Mason, as comedian, sees Alice Washburn and decides to impersonate her in his next sketch. It happens that one is to speak and the other to perform on the same night—Dan at Holburn Club and Alice at Holburn Hall, and the hackman mixes them up. Both these players do well and if there are some things in it not new, there is enough fresh fun to make it acceptable. Charles H. France produced it.

"SWEET REVENGE" (Essanay), September 17.—At times there was a good deal of laughter in the audience while this picture was on; but its fun did not seem to capture the audience as a whole. Phil (Wallace Beery) is so chesty about his health and strength that his friends conspire to make him think he is sick and succeed very well until he overhears them and the doctor, who has been let in and is helping the scheme, laughing outside the window, and then his strength comes back and he follows and sails into them for "sweet revenge." The trouble with the farce is that it is too long for so slight a situation. The acting, photography, etc., are fair.

"DUCK RAISING INDUSTRY" (Essanay), September 17.—A very interesting and fresh offering on the same reel with the foregoing. The amount of interest that one takes in such pictures is determined by his character and business; but this one is clearly photographed and full of movement and can hardly help being liked.

"THE MERRILL MURDER MYSTERY" (Patheplay), September 17.—This picture is not wholly a failure, although the "mystery" is really given away in the first act and the interest is wholly centered on how the detective is going to fasten the guilt of the murder on the villain and so clear the hero. If it had been made strongly convincing, even this might have done very well; but it has, with a good climax, weak moments. There is action in it all through.

"THE STOLEN TREATY" (Biograph), September 18.—If Claire McDowell had not been showing her versatility in picture after picture, it might have been worth while noticing that she exhibits it in this one, in the role of a cold-hearted and designing adventuress. The picture deals with an attempt to steal a treaty from the Department of State in Washington that is frustrated by a detective who a bit too clever, but it is a fair offering. The audience laughed at it when the detective so easily gets the treaty away from the foreigner; but that doesn't say they didn't enjoy it. The photography was good.

"THE BROKEN PAROLE" (Essanay), September 18.—There is one very good scene in this picture—it is that in which the detective recognizes the "paroled" man who, for the time, is not aware that he has been spotted. The man is living "on the square" and when the detective sees how things are going he decides to let him remain unknown and not take him back to prison. This theme seems a bit too old to make the best kind of offering. The picture is fair in acting and photography.

"TOAD TRAITS" (Patheplay), September 18.—This zoological offering has been prepared by Raymond L. Ditmars, Curator of Reptiles of the New York Zoological Garden, and it has a clear cut effectiveness that is not always found in motion pictures of this kind. The reviewer knew little about toads and this was deeply interesting to him. It showed few specimens; but it made every one it showed seem important. We all had a good laugh at the end over the antics of two tree toad acrobats, whom natural instinct compelled to cling to a string as long as possible, though the string was kept turning. The offering will appeal, we feel sure. It is clearly photographed.

"HOT SPRINGS AND GEYSERS OF NEW ZEALAND" (Patheplay), September 18.—On the same reel is this which will also be welcome, although it is not so freshly interesting or so pertinent as the former.

"HOME LIFE IN JAPAN" (Melies), September 18.—A particularly pleasing offering; it is full of vital information and entirely fresh. This picture will be popular. It shows, for instance, washing day in a Japanese home; home cooking in what seems like a rather smoky kitchen; an unusual glimpse of dinner time around the home table. The ceremonious serving of tea to a guest shows us how well bred folks entertain their friends. All these things are clearly pictured by the camera. We like it much.

"A JAPANESE FUNERAL OF A RICH MAN" (Melies), September 18.—On the same reel with the foregoing, this offering is also worth while; for though we have had several pictures of Oriental funerals, none has been like this. It is a very elaborate funeral and must have cost a great deal of money with its funeral trees and its decorations.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 51," September 18.—The topical this midweek devotes some space as a memorial to the late mayor and shows reprints of incidents in his life that have already been shown in the topical. This is acceptable. An item is devoted to Julius Harburger, for whom a special matinee of "Believe Me Xantippe" was given. We doubt the advisability of showing much political stuff just before election; some of the spectators may be of the other party.

"DADDY'S SOLDIER BOY" (Vitagraph), September 22.—One of these sincere pictures of sentiment that really move one. It is set in a regular army post and deals chiefly with a captain and his little boy. The father, played by Mr. Holt, is a captain and the lad, Buddie Harris, worships him and thinks him the acme of all that is noble and brave. The captain loses a great deal of money at cards and, suddenly tempted, commits embezzlement. For this his bars and buttons are cut from his uniform and he begins a term in prison. The little son, playing with the daughter of the colonel, bravely gives his life to save hers, and before he dies asks to see his daddy. The disgraced captain can't bear to let his son, who doesn't know the ins and outs of what has happened, see him in his defaced clothes. For the sake of the boy, the colonel lends his uniform so that the ex-captain can come to his son's bedside. All this is done in a subdued, artistic way without straining after effect and reflects credit on all concerned. The author is Mrs. Piggott and her script was produced by Robert Thornby. The photographs also are very clear. A very good offering.

"THE STROKE OF THE PHOEBUS EIGHT" (Edison), September 23.—A picture whose setting is the River Thames, in England, at the time of one of the greatest races. Its shortcoming is the too unpleasant quality of its situation, which, being melodramatic, is in this picture almost inexcusable. Indeed, it is safe to say that it is never safe to make a villain degrade a girl who loves him and merely to make a melodramatic point It disgusts all who see it. Then, the picture is lamed in its impression by the fact that few of its scenes actually show the throngs on the river as at the time of a big race. It would have been better to have had one or two of these crowded scenes earlier in the picture. The offering has several high merits, in the way of interesting backgrounds and pretty scenes; but it is not a success. Anne and Bannister Merwin seldom do such poor work as this. Charles Brabin produced it in England with Miriam Nesbitt and Marc MacDermott in prominent roles.

"FOR OLD TIMES' SAKE" (Essanay), September 23.—The same situation has been used and developed to much the same conclusion in other offerings; but we notice in this a more earnest attempt to make it convincing. Its weakness comes from the situation itself. We doubt whether any author or producer could take sincere interest in it, except in its possibilities in the line of dramatic art and as a means of making a picture. In this case it is more interesting to watch the way the producer has developed his picture than it itself. It is skillfully worked up; there is good acting in it and well-made scenes; but the story remains weak. The leading role is played by William Bailey as a moral weakling who is dismissed by his sweetheart (Juanita Dalmores) because he is a thief. Later, she has married (Francis X. Bushman), and the old lover comes as a burglar.

"A MEXICAN TRAGEDY" (Lubin), September 23.—A very good picture as an offering to the public. It is sure to be liked and probably will be applauded. It is not so good as the picture of about two years back with the same situation and in which George Washington was the hero. In this case a Mexican general is in jeopardy; the villain is still an inn-keeper and the victim still the inn-keeper's son. As we have said, we have reviewed the situation before; but are most sure that the audience will watch this offering with deep interest and will say, "That is surely a good situation for a picture." Velam Whitman plays the inn-keeper's daughter; W. H. Ryne, her father, and Guillemo Calles, her brother Raymond Gallager plays the federal spy who bribes the inn-keeper to stab the revolutionary general, played by Henry King. The costumes and the staging of the picture are excellent.

"POKER PAID" (Lubin), September 22.—A very slight situation which is not brought out so clearly as usual in Lubin offerings. This was not the fault of the players so much as of lack of sub-titles. There was a little laughter, not a great deal. George Terwilliger is the author and Joseph Smiley the producer.

"THIS ISN'T JOHN" (Lubin), September 22.—On the same reel with the foregoing, this farce gives laughable nonsense which is in part really laughter making and in part is not. The ending is especially good—shows a man having to eat his note to his wife, who knows that he has lied. He puts it in a sandwich. There was some laughter, which at no time became general. A. Hotaling produced it from the script of E. W. Sargent.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 52" (September 22).—The best item this Monday is the funeral of the great Socialist leader, Bebel, and it is good for the number of interesting faces that one can see in the funeral cortage. There are other interesting things in it, too.

"SUNNY," OR "THE CATTLE THIEF" (Vitagraph), September 18.—This film offers an agreeable variation from the ordinary Western release. The tomboy, Sunny, as portrayed by Marguerite Gibson, appeals to the observer as a real girl. Good photography and fine scenic effects do much to entertain. Sunny's expedient of changing the brands on her father's cattle came near resulting disastrously, but in the end everything turns out well and she gets Bob, the man of her choice. A good release

"THE LAW AND HIS SON" (Biograph), September 22.—A melodramatic story without many noticeable weaknesses. It has several situations that are well played; it is speedy in its action and it will hold well—will make a good release. The hero is a good man who is like a shorn lamb to every wind of accusation, until at the climax the villain for whose crime he had served one term in prison and for whose second crime he seems likely to serve another, is mortally wounded and confesses. The staging of the picture shows care and skill and it has been well photographed.

"THE HONOR OF THE FORCE" (Edison), September 22.—This seems to us the most unconvincing picture that the Edison Company has turned out for months. It shows that its author and its producer knew what was required of a melodrama, but in this case they did not succeed in getting a story over.

"SISSYBELLE" (Selig), September 22.—The hero of this picture is a boy who is being spoiled by his mother, but whose father knew a thing or two. It shows how the youngster is taken away to the country and how the kids make a man of him after a formal contract drawn up between the gang and the boy's father. There is some fine acting in it and one especially cute scene in which the little country girl, about eight years old, is seen sewing and talking. The best roles are taken by children, but there is substance in the situation and it will appeal to all kinds of people and can be safely counted a good offering.

"THE COUNTERFEITER'S CONFEDERATE" (Kalem), September 22.—There is freshness in this picture, though its story is not strictly new. Perhaps it would have been more popular if a sentimental ending had been used. The plot was first invented for sake of its sentiment. Anna Nilsson plays in it a double role as both of twin sisters. One of these is the "Counterfeiter's Confederate." She had been adopted from a foundling asylum by a professional beggar, while her sister had been adopted by a family of wealth, and she later tries to locate the poor sister. This opens a melodramatic story in which, on the street, she is mistaken for the counterfeiting sister by one of the "gang," and then comes an exciting close with the death of the crook sister by a shot fired by one of the gang. It is well acted, and although the story is not strong, the offering will go very fairly.

"THE BLIND GYPSY" (Patheplay), September 23.—The photography of this offering is not quite clear enough to keep the faces distinct; but the story is plain after one gets the thread of it. We cannot say much in favor of it; it's a rehash of old stuff. There is some good acting in it, especially by the hero, George Gebhardt, and by the blind gypsy's sister. It has action which is kept in motion and there are one or two very pretty water scenes.

"EXTREMITIES" (Vitagraph), September 23. This picture of which only the hands or the feet of the players appear in the scenes, suggest a better one by the Edison Company, which used the same idea and was called "A Comedy of Understanding." The idea has not been overplayed and many will think it a clever offering.

"EAST INDIAN FAKIRS" (Vitagraph), September 23.—These tricks, as most people know, are easy to fake in motion photography. They are wonderful enough; but not so convincing as when seen in person. The camera work is clear in both offerings on this reel.

"BUMPS AND WILLIE" (Selig), September 23.—"The Elopement" is given as a sub-title to this offering, as though a series of Bumps and Willie pictures contemplated. "Bumps" and "Willie" are two comedy tramps and, in this number, they dress up in cast-away evening suits and call on a woman of fashion as a foreign count and his friend. The count proposes and the woman, accepting, stipulates that he elope with her and then demands that he carry her down a ladder. It is all what has been termed laughable nonsense. The audience laughed over it a good deal, and seemed to like it.

Licensed Special

"THE YOUNG MRS. EAMES" (Selig), September 22.—A good story that has been well handled by author and producer; is clearly and effectively told. There are pretty scenes, artistically photographed and it will make a good offering. Kathlyn Williams plays the titular role, a young widow with a daughter away at boarding school. A youth falls in love with her, proposes and is accepted. Later he meets the daughter and falls in love with her. A great deal depends on the acting of such a story as this, and, in her part, the leading woman does very well indeed. She is supported by a cast of good players; but the young woman who played the juvenile role showed lack of experience in one or two places. The whole is commendable and will please.

"TROOPER BILLY" (Kalem), September 17.—Illustrating the play of the same name by Frederick Paulding, this two-part picture tells its story clearly enough and shows care in its development. It holds the interest well, although the center of that interest changes. In the early scenes we are led to believe that "Trooper Billy" who, with her sister Kate, is a guest at the post, is to be the heroine; but she is quickly captured by the Indians and kept out of the way until the end of the last act. In the meanwhile, Kate, as the sweetheart of the Colonel's son, becomes the chief center of attention, and is the character on which the action turns; for it is the scout's presumptuous love for her that, repulsed, causes him to aid the colonel's half-breed son in his vengeful plot to wipe out the post and, later, to change back and help the soldiers. The cleverness of this conspiracy is the story's backbone and its growth and final frustration furnishes battle, smoke and suspense. The romantic leads and the characters are well carried by the usual Kalem cast that make these Westerns. The photography is commendable.

"THE CLOD" (Lubin), September 18.—An impressive story of Mexico. Its central character is a peasant who is badly misnamed the "Clod"; for he has a rich farm which he has cultivated, and he has cattle and fowls. He is stolid, but this is a typical stolidity and his attitude toward the revolution is chiefly conservative, a landowner's instinct. The impressiveness of the picture comes from the showing of how deep the iron of tyranny can go before such a man becomes a true revolutionist. Revolutions founded on such wrongs as the man suffers can't be blown out easily. The picture's mistake, it seems to us, lies in the failure to turn the man into a consistent revolutionist at the end. Such a character, though made to go mad, would hardly do so easily. Then we have that horrible picture of the man, wounded and blood bespattered, which is a decided weakness; for it helped the story hardly at all and degraded the man into a dumb creature. Romaine Fielding produced it from the script of George Terwilliger and has made it vivid by perfect backgrounds that are full of life and character. He also plays the leading role in his usual imaginative way. The photography is fine.

"THE RIGHT OF WAY" (Essanay), September 19.—A two-reel number, with most of the action centering in the second reel. The first reel merely depicts the old man and his daughter defending their private burial grounds from the railway surveyors. Later the claim agent, impersonated by Francis X. Bushman, appears. The feature of the second reel is where a large automobile goes over a cliff several hundred feet high. A novel idea is brought out when the girl mines the burial grounds with arc light carbons, thinking it is dynamite. Beverly Bayne is attractive in the part of the girl. Not a strong feature offering, but entertaining.

"OUR WIVES" (Vitagraph), September 20.—A breezy farce comedy, written by Anthony E. Wills. Ten members of the Vitagraph company combine forces to make this a successful picture. The fun centers largely in the second reel, where the two husbands hide in the trunks of the leading lady. All sorts of complications ensue and bring forth a great deal of laughter. The photography, settings and characterizations are all pleasing and the result is a farcial offering much above the average in interest.

Independent

"THE OUTLAW'S REDEMPTION" (Nestor), October 1.—A badly wanted outlaw saves a girl from an attack made by his former partner. Later he comes to the aid of the sheriff, and so begins a better life. The picture is not particularly new, but has some points of merit.

"THE SHOEMAKER AND THE DOLL" (Majestic), September 21.—There is a touch of genuine pathos in this reel, featuring William Garwood as the shoemaker whose long awaited child dies at sea. He at first becomes very bitter over his loss, but later learns to love all children and mends their shoes free of charge. Mr. Garwood did not quite succeed in looking like an Italian, but his handling of the part was sincere. A good heart-interest number.

"THE UMPIRE" (Majestic), September 23.—A half reel in which Fred Mace disports himself as umpire at a Los Angeles ball game. The setting and photography are good, but more plot was needed.

"AN ESTHETIC MATCH" (Majestic), September 23.—This, on same reel with above, is better comedy. It concerns the love affair of Artie and Gwendolin, and has some quite laughable moments.

"THE OFFICIAL GOAT PROTECTOR" (Thanhouser), September 26.—There is a good comedy idea in this film, wherein Riley Chamberlain, as the girl's miserly guardian, keeps a shotgun and a goat to frighten away her wooers. How the three friends disguise themselves as policemen and steal the goat makes a breezy little yarn, of more than average merit.

"AN UNFAIR EXCHANGE" Thanhouser), September 23.—The presence of two pretty twin girls in this picture helps the interest very much. One of them enters New York alone and gets into a tenement house, where her girl double exchanges clothes with her. There was not quite enough contrast in the way they were dressed. The story, however, holds the attention well and both girls finally find a happy home with the first one's grandfather. A nice little story.

"OXYGEN" (Eclair), October 5.—This shows how the use of oxygen permits men to walk in poisonous gases, such as fire damp in mines; also its use in cutting steel.

"PRIVATE BOX 23" (Eclair), October 5.—On same reel with above. A comedy of slight interest, though well acted. A letter intended for the cook creates trouble between the husband and wife, but this is straightened out after some amusing complications.

"THE FATAL TAXICAB" (Keystone), September 18.—A typical amusing offering of the burlesque type, in which Sterling, Mabel and the Fat Boy come into a new series of adventures. The Italian Count is pursued by the Keystone police. His auto falls over a cliff and lodges in a tree Nothing offensive in this, but some rattling good nonsense with which to enliven a program.

"LOADED DICE" (Kay-Bee), October 3.—A strong one reel Western offering. Two men on the desert shake dice to see which shall take the burro and the last of the water. One substitutes loaded dice and wins by foul means. Later events bring the hero to safety and he returns good for evil by going to the rescue of the man who defrauded him. A strong release.

"WHEN DREAMS COME TRUE" (Keystone), September 22.—This burlesque offering is of rather coarse humor and will perhaps not appeal to all audiences. The suitcase full of live snakes creates havoc in Sterling's bedroom. He dashes out in his night clothes and there is much rough and tumble excitement, in which the snakes play a large part.

"THE NORWOOD CASE" (Crystal), October 5.—A story of lost memory. The young husband is injured during the construction of a building. He loses his recollection of former things and marries again. His wife also marries after several years. Then a second injury brings back Chester's memory and he returns home, like Enoch Arden, to find another there. A very old plot and not very strongly handled; but we watched it with considerable interest. It is at least consistent and the photography is good.

"HIS BROTHER'S WIVES" (Nestor), October 3.—A burlesque that is sure to find favor with the majority and is sure to make a roar of laughter. It has been cleverly staged; but its best asset is in the crisp, sparkling way in which the players have done their parts—they have kept the right spirit up through the whole reel. He who is referred to in the title has a job in a New York office, but his brother has been elected sultan. The sultan brother asks him to take his job while on vacation. If we told the story, the narrative might seem vulgar; but the picture sails through with clean skirts and the harem scenes provoke laughter without offending. It will make a good offering.

"LIKE DARBY AND JOAN" (Rex), October 5.—A fine, human story is this, well pictured and pleasing. Darby's story, interpolated with lines from the well known poem, gets hold of the observer's sympathies and is full of interest. Robert Leonard and Marguerita Fischer play the leads. A strong offering.

"A HOUSEBOAT ELOPEMENT" (Powers), October 1.—A comedy where much of the mirth is of the forced sort. There are laughs at times; it is doubtful, though, if there will be any from desirable patrons when the pastor who is portrayed as a boob performs a soul kiss on the bride. Judgment on the part of a director would have prevented this. Also it would have avoided so much jacknife doubling up and kneeslapping on the part of the boy. This is not comedy; and it is not funny.

"THE EXONERATION" (Domino), October 2.—Another story of England and America in the 16th century. The scenes display the period with care, and the story of the young hero, falsely accused of theft, is nicely presented. He escapes from the convict boat and joins the Puritans on their way to America. Later the love story develops and he marries Faith. Cobb, the villain in the piece, reappears, but is mortally wounded during an attack by Indians and confesses that he had fastened the original crime on Richard. A good offering.

"A GIRL OF THE DANCE HALLS" (Frontier), October 4.—A Western story of rather striking coincidences. It is about a mistress of a bad man who upon the death of her partner turns a new leaf and later marries a man who is ignorant of her past. All misunderstandings are later satisfactorily cleared up. The picture is not strong.

"THE SHOP GIRL'S BIG DAY" (Frontier), October 2.—There is a good story here, and it is well acted. Dot Farley has the lead, taking the part of a shop girl who fails to deliver an outfit to a woman customer and instead wears the garments for a day She has adventures which are interesting. We noticed George P. Hamilton, the head producer of the company, in the role of the storekeeper. He has not forgotten how to act.

"THE TRAP" (Powers), October 3.—In this offering a jealous girl puts paint on her lover's overcoat and becomes excited when she finds the traces of it on another girl's waist. But it develops that her lover's brother has worn the coat in the meantime, and she is pacified after an explanation. The story is not overly strong, though some of the scenes are attractive.

"HIS PRICELESS TREASURE" (Imp), October 4.—The burlesque situation where the landlord and his wife blow up their own safe is the best thing in this number. Its comedy is frankly horse play for the most part and not extremely funny. The guest's priceless treasure was merely a lock of his girl's hair.

"INVISIBLE INK" (Solax), September 17.—A good comic picture that will be liked and counted amusing by most spectators. The best character in it is a spinster, played delightfully by Fraunie Fraunholz. Darwin Karr and Vinnie Burns have the juvenile roles and Vinnie's father dislikes Darwin. It seems unusually well thought out for a farce and many unexpected and laughable things come up in it. It is well staged and clearly photographed.

"WESTERN LOVE" (Solax), September 19.—Such a title promises little; but we were pleasingly surprised by what the picture gave. There are fresh and unexpected touches of imagination in it and it shows skilled stagecraft. For instance, having the visions stay always as visions and not come boldly out as real, shows commonsense. In its handling of visions, this offering has something to teach nearly all other producers. It is a picture with action, freshness and art and shows a big advance on recent work that has come from this studio. The Solax Company has a good camera man; that has been true for some time.

"HEARTS OF THE DARK" (Reliance), September 29.—This story gets an interesting start, the observer becoming quite interested in the young widow who attempted theft and was placed in the reformatory. Later she escapes from the institution, kidnaps her own child, and is married. The appearance of the second couple was not well accounted for, and the story ended rather weakly. The photography was good throughout

Independent Specials

"CAPTAIN BILLY'S MATE" (Bison), September [illegible].—A sea yarn in two parts, of a [illegible] girl [illegible] to its captain. Just before setting sail it is found that the [illegible] man [illegible] is [illegible] from the shore, a [illegible] young man who has been drinking. The picture makes a good offering [illegible] the story is unusual, at least [illegible]. We dare not call it a strong story, for it is rather improbable, except that it is intended [illegible] and, as such, will [illegible] satisfy the majority. Besides, there is some humor and laughable incidents, set [illegible] between the darkie cook and the rather peppery Captain Billy. It will entertain. Grace Cunard plays Captain Billy very well. The photography is clear.

"GOOD FOR NOTHING JACK" (Bison), October [illegible].—The girl elopes with Jack [illegible] her father's opposition. Some years later Jack proves [illegible] Ned, her former lover, appears and the story moves along to some interesting situations in the second reel, wherein the child [illegible] away with the money in a valise. This is the old style of Western offering but tells a definite story and for this reason has considerable interest. A two-reel number.

"THE GREENHORN" (Broncho), October 1.—A two-reel number in which the observer follows the fortunes of a young Russian [illegible] enlisted in the U. S. Army. The story gets up a strong interest. The Indian uprising, the sand storm and many other features are excellently done. Schultz's change of heart when he saw the manner in which [illegible] was welcomed by the troopers on his return was effectively shown, but we should like to have seen him live after his display of courage. In this manner the story would have come up to a much stronger finish. A good release.

"THE CLOSED DOOR" (Victor), October 3.—This is a two-reel picture, which marks the return to the screen after a year's absence of Miss Florence Lawrence, is reviewed at length in another column of this issue.

"ESCAPED FROM THE ASYLUM" (Imp), September 18.—In these two reels there is more than a plain attempt made to cater to those persons to whom scandal is as the breath of their nostrils. If this picture did not in a measure follow the path of a case that has been a stench for seven years there would be absolutely no reason for giving it birth. It is not surprising that the recent events in Canada and New Hampshire should furnish a film man with an excuse for making a picture around them; it is surprising, though, that the Universal Company should lend its name to it. The story as a story is nil. It may not be out of place to say right here that this journal has declined to permit its columns to be used in any way to give publicity to pictures of this stripe.

"JEPTHAH'S DAUGHTER" (Warner's Features).—There is much that must be highly praised in this picture; but three or four times it falls into what is not very far from the ridiculous. In the first place, it has a good story, made-up; but far from impossible. This is more than half the battle. Then there are some wholly lovely scenes. The first of these is Jepthah's daughter and her maid talking together, and among them is a beautiful scene when she comes out of the tents with her maidens to greet the returning victer. But some may find fault with the settings provided which are without warrant in the text unless a "house" meant a "tent." The battle scenes are so poor that they harm the effect of the whole. With so few players these should have been taken close up. We think that the picture will be acceptable on its merits. It features Arthur Maude and Constance Crawley, ably assisted by Miss Bostwick. J. F. McDonald is the producer.

"BACK TO LIFE" (Warner's Features).—A real melodrama in two parts made to appeal to the rudimentary part of us and good enough to entertain the tired business man. There is plenty of action in it of very passable quality and no intellectual appeal whatever. The villain, heroine and hero are well played by people who know their business; but the villain is especially well played and the heroine is not only natural, but very pretty. The villain steals the bridegroom-to-be on his way to the church to be married and, keeping him in captivity, has his coat found near the water with a letter seeming to prove him involved with another woman. He escapes in time to confront the villain at the altar when he is about to marry the heroine and these last few scenes are full of life and very good. It is well photographed and shows good stagecraft.

"CARDS" (Ramo).—A melodrama that asks, we think, for too much credulity in the spectator; the story is neither convincing enough to be startling nor has it any freshness except that of arrangement. Yet there is much in it that will attract and, in scene making, backgrounds, lighting and photography, it shows high merits. It opens with an artistic lamplight scene in which the heroine (Lurat Huntley) is discovered telling her own fortune with cards. They prophesy a romance and, although she is a married woman, she starts out to manufacture it at once. This love story of hers with the man who has come from the city, especially her going to him at night after she has betrayed her smuggler husband (Stewart Holmes) to the officers and thinks him dead, could not be a love story and all that follows is out of joint and quite illogical; even the characters change. Jim's way of spending the hush money he gets from her is strange. It has action, broken backed and disjointed as it is, and it has moments of prettiness. The staging (William S. Davis produced it) is excellent; the story very poor.

"A FAITHFUL SERVITOR" (Gaumont).—We can safely count this two-part picture a good offering. It was made in America and has George Gebhardt in the leading role as a faithful Indian servant to a Mexican family. His services in protecting the daughter of the house from the machinations of the villain who wants to abduct her are as those of a trustworthy dog, and the role of simple tame savage is played to stir our sympathy. The offering is commendable, is good chiefly because it is wholly a romantic melodrama. It doesn't pretend to be better than it is and gets all the poetry out of its [illegible] and, by nature, poetic way of looking at things. It is full of good action, naturally performed; it is pretty well acted; the backgrounds are interesting and go with the story and, being clearly photographed, it has many lovely scenes. We enjoyed it ourselves.

"THE FLIGHT FROM JUSTICE" (Great Northern).—A three-part offering that cannot correctly be called strong on account of its flimsy and unconvincing story. But, on the other hand, it has one real throat-catching sensation and several others that are worth while and it has good comedy. The heroine is on an express with a detective and she wants to escape. She asks him to get her a drink of water and then slips to the roof of the mail car where she jumps out on the big overhanging rod and is landed safely on the train going the other way. It is a very well acted melodrama and the sets and scenes are full of freshness and much interest. As for the staging and all the work on making it, it is all fine; the story alone is weak.

"THE LIVING CORPSE" (Warner's Features).—Tolstoy's great story, known to English readers by this title, has been illustrated by this four-reel picture. It cannot fail to interest many spectators for this reason; but it can hardly be counted a great offering to American audiences. The outcome of the story turns on Russian law which, in this case, is quite different from what we are used to and so the picture needs an explanation that it in itself doesn't furnish, and is hampered. The central character is a drunken man who, even in his degradation, retains some shreds of former manhood and who commits suicide in the end to right a wrong that he had occasioned by letting his wife think that he had done so years before. The staging of the pictures seems very truly Russian and has been very commendably done, in any case. To us, this Russian atmosphere seems the picture's best asset. It is well acted and the camera work is good.

"BLEEDING HEARTS" or "JEWISH FREEDOM UNDER KING CASIMIR OF POLAND" (Imp), October 2.—This is a very commendable three-reel production. It is a historical drama setting forth the sufferings of the Jews in Poland during the reign of King Casimir, a just, warm-hearted, but violent-tempered man. Through the machinations of one of his noblemen, who bears the Jews a grudge, he is persuaded to order a wholesale execution of them and exile of the entire people. A very pretty love story is woven into this main theme. The various personages are well characterized, particularly the Count and Esther's father. The producer deserves much of the credit for this praiseworthy effort. His settings of Casimir's court, the synagogue and the rabbi's garden are well done. The picture will meet with wide approval. It is a noteworthy effort..

"THE MAN FROM THE GOLDEN WEST" (Warner's features).—In this picture, which was filmed by Mittenthal, James J. Corbett, one-time prize-fighter, is featured. This fact that Corbett appears in the picture, and appears much, has been the justification for the makers putting out such a story. With another leading man something in the way of script would have been necessary to put over the production. Mr. Corbett himself is satisfactory, considering he is new to picture making. It will be remembered that he has had stage experience. There is a claim jumping episode, a polo game, a holdup, a bond forgery, a murder, after which we see the dripping knife; the mystery of the killing is solved by reason of the photograph of the murderer showing in the eyes of the man who was killed. Jim is sent to prison on circumstantial evidence, which of necessity must be strong, but in this case there was none in sight. There are sufficient incidents to please those who like some kinds of "action." By the way, why does Mr. Corbett buy so many shirts of one pattern? The identical figure follows all through the many months covered by the story. The picture is in four parts.

"A FIGHT TO DEATH" (Warner's Features).—This three-reel picture was made by Savoia Film Company. There is an absence of heart interest. To make up for this deficiency there is action aplenty. In the beginning there is the atmosphere of the circus, which seems to be a popular vehicle in the making of pictures on the other side of the water. One of the important incidents is the robbery of an embassy of a secret treaty and the attempts to recover it. There are some fine settings and good photography.

"IN THE CLUTCHES OF THE KU-KLUX KLAN" (Warner's Features).—This good three-reel picture was made by the Gene Gauntier players in Florida. There is an abundance of semi-tropical settings, which are splendidly photographed. Sidney Olcott produces the picture. Miss Gauntier has the role of the daughter of a newspaper editor who has aroused the animosity of the klan and is by them captured and imprisoned in the belfry of an old church. Jack Clark is a member of the klan who falls in love with the newspaper man's daughter and through his friendship for her is persecuted by his former friends. Alf Hollingsworth writes the script and plays the role of the editor. The story is based on the organization which flourished in the South in reconstruction days, and may be said in a measure to be of historical and consequently educational interest. There is a wealth of exciting incident. The acting is just what might be expected from these players; the production will make a good release.

"THE VAMPIRE" (Kalem).

Bert French and Alice Eis, whose amazing "Vampire Dance" has met with such tremendous popularity both in this country and abroad, are featured in the new Kalem three-part feature "The Vampire." This film will be released Wednesday, Oct. 15.

As can be seen by the title, the story is based upon the "Vampire Dance." Taken by itself, the story is sufficiently powerful to make a picture of unusual interest, but in conjunction with the dance the result is one of the most powerful features ever produced by Kalem.

Scene from "The Vampire" (Kalem).

"The Vampire Dance," as will be remembered by those who have been fortunate enough to see Bert French and Miss Eis, tells the story of a young artist lured to his death by a vampire in the guise of a wood nymph. The beauty and amazing grace of this monster fascinates the artist who, despite his struggles, is enmeshed by her terrible wiles. It is a feature so surcharged with realism that the beholder chafes under a sense of helplessness at being unable to render aid to the doomed victim.

The photography is superb and as clear as crystal. Some of the settings, notably that of the fashionable restaurant, mark a new point in sumptuousness. It is claimed that this restaurant is an exact replica in point of size and appearance of Broadway's most famous dining place.

"SHADOWS OF LIFE" (Rex).

Love, the actuating motive of lofty heroism, fiendish crimes, noble ambitions and great achievements the world over, has been made the theme of this two-reel drama, acted and directed by the Smalleys. When treated from an angle that discourages triteness, the theme of love has always made, and will always make, the supreme drama; a story that entwines itself around the interest and loftiest sentiments of the spectator with subtle security. Lois Weber who, in collaboration with E. J. Clauson, wrote the piece, is famous through filmdom for her ability to inject psychological power into her writings. "Shadows of Life" discloses ripe judgment on the writer's part in combining all those qualities of romance, conflicting sentiments and dramatic incidents with well rounded action. Nothing has ever approached it in the way of romantic dramas.

Miss Weber, as the woman who has been married for her money, sadly contemplates the life of her own choosing. Below a dinner party is in progress, presided over by the husband who married her alone for wealth. He is surrounded by his friends, shallow, laughing marionettes, all of them distasteful to the wife and below her level in every way. Wine is red and life high when the husband marks the absence of his wife. Against her wishes she is led into the company.

At the height of the revel a wandering musician passes the house, playing upon his violin. Phillips Smalley, in this role, breaks away from anything yet accomplished, with the finished skill of a matured actor and the intelligence that is his in a large measure, he plays with wonderful feeling. As the musician he is called in and marks the fine woman out of her own sphere. From the depths of his soul he plays to the disappointed wife; he plays a tune which she alone can understand. To the musician she becomes a divinity. The husband gradually degenerates and, later, in seeking to rid himself of the wife who chafes him with her dignity and restraint, kills her. How the musician, though losing his divinity, finds her and how the husband is brought to a timely end through the natural course of circumstances, is taken up in the rest of the picture.

Scene from "Shadows of Life" (Rex).

GLEICHMAN ESTABLISHING BRANCHES.

Phil Gleichman, vice-president and general manager of the World Special Films Corporation, returned from Philadelphia, Monday, after having made arrangements with William C. Karrer to take charge of the Philadelphia branch office, which will be located at No. 1316 Vine Street. Extensive alterations are to be made in the building which will delay the opening of the office until about October 1.

Mr. Benjamin Judell, formerly with the Western Milwaukee and Mutual Film Exchange, Minneapolis, has been engaged as manager of the Minneapolis branch office of the World Special Films Corporation, which will be located in the Temple Court Building.

AUTOMATIC TICKET SELLER SELLING.

That remarkable little time-saving device, the automatic ticket seller, since the New York trade exposition, has been selling like hot-cakes to exhibitors everywhere. The Automatic Ticket Selling and Cash Register Company, of 1476 Broadway, N. Y., manufacturers of this article, report that they have just received orders for installations for an entire circuit in Western Canada, seven theaters in New York City and four in New Jersey.

"HEARTS OF THE DARK" (Reliance).

As is the case with most of Forrest Halsey's stories, "Hearts of the Dark" is something more than a mere drama with a strong plot and the power to interest and entertain. Mr. Halsey has a way of furnishing a little food for thought in connection with his plays that adds materially to their value, and "Hearts of the Dark" is doubly interesting because of the light it sheds upon the temptations that assail some of the weaker members of the "Brotherhood of Man"

Scene from "Hearts of the Dark" (Reliance).

Edith, a poor girl, whose position in a fashionable modist's shop throws her into constant contact with wealthy society women, is caught in the act of yielding to an impulse to steal a purse in order that she may be able to better care for her sick child. She is sent to a reformatory and her child is put in an orphan asylum. A woman of the underworld becomes friendly with her and in later years after Edith has married a worthy man, uses her knowledge of Edith's past to blast her reputation and ruin her happiness. Edith's husband remains loyal in spite of the disclosures regarding her life and saves her to himself and a happy future.

With Irene Hunt as Edith, Anna Luther as Mag, and Paul Scardon as Dick, the husband of Edith, "Hearts of the Dark" is an excellent single reel offering. Released September 29.

"THE TAKING OF RATTLESNAKE BILL" (Lubin).

An excellent comedy drama full of intense interest and many surprises. The old special officer is a finely drawn character and proves himself a hero against terrible odds. He saves the solvency of a bank and promotes a beautiful love romance. The cast is one of the best the Lubin Studio can furnish. A complete synopsis of this picture will appear in next week's issue in the department of Film Stories.

Scene from "The Taking of Rattlesnake Bill" (Lubin).

"A GOOD CATCH" (Great Northern).

Will Stevens and Jack Price are fellow students and after a night out, the former is discovered on the dining-room couch filled with remorse and hazy recollections of the night before. The arrival of Jack Price arouses him and he comes to a realization that he is in dire straits and must sooner or later meet the "gentlemen" who have called for payments. Stevens is on the point of suicide when he meets a charming damsel and his spirits become more cheerful. Price proposes a visit to the seaside, in search of an heiress and there they meet Mr. and Mrs. Hall and their two daughters. Stevens invites the elder of the two for a walk in the moonlight, but after a short saunter he espies Elsie, the charmer of his darker days. Kate, the elder sister, is quickly passed along to Price and a merry dinner party follows. Then comes an invitation from Stevens at Acacia Mansions.

Scene from "A Good Catch" (Gt. Northern).

When Stevens starts to make his arrangements for the reception of his guests, he finds the lights turned off, the telephone disconnected and many of his bits of rare furniture missing. In the emergency, he borrows some props from the landlady, but during the festivities, that worthy lady appears upon the scene and demands her belongings. At this juncture the telephone is reinstalled, the lights are in perfect working order and the "sticks" and furniture so dearly cherished by Stevens, are restored to him. Elsie has been his good angel and the family party proves a joyous affair. The comedy is splendidly acted and the Great Northern comedy forces are seen to excellent advantage.

ANOTHER STRAW ON THE CAMEL'S BACK.

The latest wrinkle in Chicago surveillance of the motion picture theaters is to print a certification on the ticket, stating that the house has complied with all the requirements of the Board of Health in furnishing a sufficiency of fresh air for patrons. When this move was determined last week, it was stated that 175 motion picture theaters would comply with this new demand put upon them. Now, as there are over 500 motion picture theaters in Chicago, that have all been built under city inspection, paid good money for license and apparently complied with all demands of the police, fire and building inspection departments, the exact justice of singling out a few theaters and placing the many under suspicion is not determinate. Perhaps the best answer to this will be the appearance of various companies, who will guarantee to put in fresh air in the theaters at a minimum expense to add something to the growing burden of house managers and theater owners.

MILWAUKEE CENSOR ORDINANCE.

An ordinance has been offered the common council of Milwaukee, Wis., providing for a committee of three councilmen, to act without pay and a secretary at a salary of $1,500 yearly, to censor motion pictures intended to be shown in theaters in Milwaukee. It is proposed to charge a fee of 50 cents for each picture to pay the cost of censoring.

SAVOIA FILM MAKES "JOAN OF ARC."

Marie Jacobini as Joan of Arc.

One of the big announcements of the week is the forthcoming spectacular production of "Joan of Arc," which has been made in eight reels by the Savoia Film Company, the well-known European manufacturer of great features. It will be handled exclusively on this side of the water by the Eclair company. The title role will be sustained by Miss Marie Jacobini, the celebrated Italian actress, who by many has been hailed as the legitimate successor of the Divine Sarah, and who has put forth in the making of this great picture all of her splendid talent.

That the production will be one that will rank with the best the reputation of its manufacturer guarantees. That the subject is one that will make wide appeal to every division of society, from the humblest to the most powerful, there can be no question. The history of this wonderful woman, this girl, this child—she was only nineteen years old when by an act of cruelty unequaled in all the history of mankind she was burned at the stake—is known to the world, and better known today than it was a hundred years ago. Unable to read or write, Joan of Arc organized armies, won battles for France, placed its King on his throne; and in her several trials for heresy matched wits with and defeated on their own ground the keenest theologians in France. The exhibition of this elaborate pictorial interpretation of the life of the greatest woman in history will be awaited with the keenest interest.

"A LIFE FOR A LIFE."

(Film Releases of America).

War and woe in the stirring, picturesque days when the first Napoleon was terrorizing Europe forms the back-bone of "A Life for a Life," the fifth feature of the Film Releases of America. A hundred years ago, the period of the story, was more interesting to the eye in regard to warfare than it is today, when the opposing forces rarely see one another. Accordingly it offers better opportunities for the camera.

Scene from "A Life For a Life."

There's a touch of Sardou's "Tosca" in the tragic finale of the story. The heroine, by the way a super-capable actress, begs for the life of her captive sweetheart. How the French commander tricks her and how she avenges herself are rather to be seen than told.

The scenes are laid in winter and some beautiful photographs of the woodlands in their crystal coverings are shown.

JULES BURNSTEIN WITH WORLD SPECIAL FILMS.

Jules Burnstein, whose reputation in the film exchange business is too well known among exhibitors to need any introduction, has been engaged by the World Special Films Corportation as general manager of the evchange end of its business. Mr. Burnstein has devoted about ten years to the film game, and has perhaps come into personal contact with as many exhibitors as any man now in the film rental business. He has always endeavored to give his best services and best efforts toward making a success of the business of the men with whom he came in contact. Both parties to the new contract are to be congratulated and we bespeak success for each.

"MIDGAR FEATURES."

The Middleton-Garrison Feature Film Company (Inc.) has opened offices at 135 West 44th Street, New York, for the sale of the productions of a number of foreign manufacturers. Cecil Charles Graham is the manager in charge.

NOTES OF THE TRADE.

THOS. RICKETTS has just completed in two reels the Proctor-Sullivan poem and song "The Lost Chord," which will be released soon under the title "The Trail of the Lost Chord." Nothing is left to the imagination and Mr. Ricketts is deserving of much credit for his masterly handling of this difficult subject.

J. W. Cotter, who has been managing the Kansas City office of the Universal organization, has assumed full charge of the Warner branch office in that city. Mr. Cotter has earned an enviable reputation for efficiency and big things are expected of him in his new berth.

George Terwilliger, who before Saturday, September 20th, was the undefeated swimmer of Lubinville, met his waterloo before about 1,000 spectators in the Schuylkill River in racing with Isadore Schwartz, assistant studio manager. Others in the race were Edwin Barbour, L. S. McCloskey, H. A. D'Arcy and Nobert Lusk, who came in the order named.

A second company formed to manufacture Western Features has completed negotiations with the Exclusive Supply Corporation to go upon its program. Joseph Miles, General Manager of the Exclusive, is now preparing the contracts for both companies, whose names will be announced in the near future.

The Thanhouser plant seems to be long on vaudeville material. The veteran of the New Rochelle studio, Helen Badgley, filled in a week recently at the local Loew variety shop. Helen is sometimes known as the Thanhouser Kidlet, having attained the mature age of four. She does an imitation act of the great cyclonic comedienne Eva Tanguay, in a real coat of mail.

"Zuma, the Gypsy," is the Kleine-Cines two-reel which made such a tremendous sensation abroad and which is to be released by George Kleine in America, Tuesday, November 4th. This is the "Cines" in which Madame Hesperia dances with a giant Python, undoubtedly one of the most thrilling and novel effects ever seen in a picture. Madame Hesperia plays Zuma, the Gypsy girl, and is hired to perform the dance with a big snake in a mammoth reception hall.

Mr. and Mrs. William Bechtel, of the Edison Company, are taking their first vacation since going into motion pictures five years ago. It is needless to say that they are having the time of their lives, as they are enjoying the fine roads in Upper New York, New Jersey, and Long Island in their new runabout "built for two."

Henry Steiner, one of the scenic artists of the Selig Polyscope Company, who has been stationed in California, returned last week to attend the funeral of his mother, who is also the mother-in-law of Gabriel Pollock, the scenic director of the big plant in Chicago, and will remain in that city. Otto Schussling, the well-known scenic artist, formerly connected with the Chicago Auditorium, has gone out to the Edendale Studio, of the Selig Company, in California.

Warner's Features, Inc., will shortly release a splendid three-part feature, entitled "For the Heart of a Princess." It is a Matthews production and embodies a number of original ideas in direction and photography. The cast is a celebrated one and the costumes more gorgeous than any ever before used in motion pictures. "For the Heart of a Princess" will be released as a part of the Warner Program.

A very complete restaurant service has been opened in a spacious room built on property to the left of the Thanhouser studio that the concern recently bought. One strong reason for the Thanhouser lunchroom is the winter. It's approaching and the regular New Rochelle restaurants are a little distance from the picture plant.

NEW ENGLAND AND CANADA.

MR. M. L. MACHAT, manager of the Standard Feature Film Company, 665 Washington Street, Boston, finds that New England exhibitors are eager to rent the features he has to offer. Among the reels that have been turning the trick for Mr. Machat are: Judge Ben Lindsey in "Saved By the Juvenile Court," "Satan," "The Third Degree," "The Wizard of the Jungle," "The Black Snake," "In the Sultan's Power," "Lost Memory," "Blindness of Courage," "Revolutionary Wedding," "In the Serpent's Coils" and "The Earl of Essex." The Machat Feature Film Company originally owned this business, which was changed to its present name recently. At least one new feature each week is promised by this enterprising concern.

Warner's Features are getting ready for a big business in the New England territory. Mr. Harry F. Campbell, well known hereabouts, and formerly assistant manager of the New England Universal Film Exchange, has been secured as New England manager, with offices at 665 Washington Street, Boston. Mr. Campbell will launch his program, consisting of three three or four-reel subjects each week, on September 29 and already has signed a large number of exhibitors. Mr. Campbell intends to protect his customers, by giving them exclusive service in their territory. For instance, the city of Boston has been divided up into three sections, only one house in each division to get the Warner service. This is a plan that appeals strongly to New England exhibitors. "The Clue of the Broken Finger," a thrilling three-reel detective story, and "Theodora," have attracted much favorable comment among exhibitors.

The Famous Players' Company, of New England, with offices at 100 Boylston Street, Boston, is a very busy place these days, and is extending its business to every part of New England. Manager Harry Asher feels confident that the demand for features of merit is on the increase, which means good times, as Famous Players' features are all worthy of their name.

Lynn, Mass., theaters had to disgorge themselves of $100 as a license fee this year, as a new law calls for this sum for all theaters with a seating capacity of over 500. The old figure was $50 and the exhibitors hated to "come across." The consensus of opinion seems to be that the law would be more fair had it read "all houses seating over 800" instead of 500.

At the annual Labor Day parade, held in Boston, the Moving Picture Operators' Union was well represented, as a good-sized turn-out appeared in the parade. The Union entertained John Bunny and Mr. R. D. Marson, of the R. D. Marson Moving Picture Company, Boston, who were special guests of the local during the parade. Former International presidents John J. Barry, P. J. Barry, and Patrick Maloney, all of the Boston Theatrical Stage Employees' Union, and officers of the Boston branch of the Actors' Union were also guests. The Operators' Union was in command of President James F. Burke, and had a float showing the predicted schoolroom of the future, with children being taught by talking-moving pictures. There were 102 men, and the showing was most creditable, especially the thought back of the float. Of course John Bunny was in a carriage, as was Mr. R. D. Marson and Agent Franke, of the Boston local.

The Orienta building, 2148 to 2156 Washington Street, Boston, was sold this week to Pierce L. McCarthy by Annie Youngerman. This is a large four-story brick structure containing offices, a large hall, called the Orienta, and the Orienta Theater.

Harold E. Brenton, president of the Boston Musicians' Union, returned to Boston last week from New York bearing with him a tentative agreement to be put into effect in fifty-six vaudeville and photoplay theaters in Boston. He reported that he had a conference with New York theater managers lasting fourteen hours. Demands were made by the Boston Union for a wage rate of $27 for a week of thirty-six working hours. The New York conference brought about a compromise of $27 for a week of thirty-nine hours. Heretofore fifty-one hours has been the ordinary week's work. It remains to be seen if the exhibitors will pay the new scale

Assistant Manager George Appleby, of the Boston offices of the Mutual Film Corporation, is in great form these days, and he put a real big one "across" when he lined Manager Halsey's big National Theater up for Mutual films, starting September 15. The National is B. F. Keith's Boston house, playing vaudeville and photoplays at popular prices, and Mr. Appleby's deal is considered to be quite a feather in the Mutual's cap.

Mr H F. Campbell, besides being New England manager for Warner's Features, is a member of the firm of Grant & Campbell, owners of several photoplay houses, among which is the Princess Theater at Marlboro, Mass. Mr. Campbell recently took a motion picture of Mayor Gleason, of Marlboro, on his departure to Europe on the Arabic. The reel runs 500 feet, and upon the Mayor's return a special performance will be given at the Princess, at which the Mayor and other public officials will be the special guests. After the performance, Mr. Campbell will present the Mayor with the 500 feet of film. Feature pictures and no vaudeville is the Grant & Campbell policy, and it has proven a good one.

Manager Dunne, of the Waterville, Me., office of the Mutual Film Corporation, was in Boston this week, and reports good trade in his section.

Colonel Willard H. Stanton, resident manager of the Auditorium Theater, Fitchburg, Mass., for the past year, under the control of Harry Katzes, has resigned that position in order to take charge of the Central Square Theater, Lynn, Mass., where he was located before going to the Auditorium. The Colonel has the reputation of being a producer of good results for his theaters.

The members of the Edmonton, Canada, Exhibition Association, made up of managers of local moving picture theaters, have declared a lockout on all union musicians. Thirty odd men were thrown out of a job by this ukase. The Edmonton exhibitors had been having some trouble with the union musicians, and declared war on them.

The Hyperion Theater, New Haven, Conn., has started its last season as a "legitimate" theater under the management of the Shuberts. Mr. S. Z. Poli purchased the land on which the Hyperion stands, some time ago, and comes into possession of the theater on May 1, when the present lease expires. Mr. Poli will promptly institute vaudeville and picture programs.

Manager C. W. Cunier, of the Opera House, Milford, Mass., finds that his patrons like the Edison talking pictures very well. Business at this house has been of the capacity order since its opening, and the Tivoli Theater, of Milford, found business so slow as to cause it to close after the Opera House opened.

Streeter and McCarthy, managers of the Victoria Theater, Greenfield, Mass., are playing to standing room only these days. Why? "Quo Vadis?"

Mr. H. S. Davis, manager of the Bijou Theater, of Greenfield, Mass., opened his house for the season on September 2, and his programs of vaudeville and pictures are again meeting with public favor.

Mr. Weseley—you all know him—has secured the services of Mr. O. C. Barker as manager of says" Mr. Barker is "there" and Weseley knows! says" Mr. Barker is "there" and Weseley knows. Mr. Barker succeeds Mr. Wilson.

Mr. J. B. Bishop closed his Gem Theater, Peaks Island, Maine, on September 6, after a really successful season with motion picture programs.

Mr. Louis M. Boas, manager of the Premier Theater, Fall River, Mass., opened this house for its new season on September 1. Motion pictures make up the Premier's program; no vaudeville being used. Mr. Boas is a very busy, as well as very able manager, as he attends to the Academy and Savoy theaters, also of Fall River.

Mr. J. Heath, for some time manager of Smith's Theater, Woonsocket, R. I., a photoplay house, has resigned to take a similar position with Lynch's Theater, Hudson, Mass., owned by Mr. E. W. Lynch, of Worcester, Mass. The mere fact that Mr. Lynch selected manager Heater to care for his Hudson house tells on the face of it that the latter is "a good man," as Mr. Lynch is particular in choosing his managers.

William Fox's new Fox Theater, Waterbury, Conn., is doing a big business; vaudeville, black and white pictures, Kinemacolor features and specialties being among the reasons.

Manager W. D. Ascough, of Poli's Theater at Hartford, Conn., closed his season of stock company attractions, as the regular season of vaudeville and pictures is slated for September 22.

Feature pictures, illustrated songs and no vaudeville is the policy of Julius Cahn's Opera House, Lowell, Mass., which opened the season on September 1 to good business.

Mr. W. F. Gilmore, formerly associated with the Theater Voyons, Lowell, Mass., has switched over to Keith's Theater, Lowell.

Manager Parker Burke, of Bullock's Theater, Providence, R. I., reports unusually brisk business since August 25, when this house reopened.

Mr. John R. Oldfield opened his Nickel Theater, Lawrence, Mass., to good business last week. The policy is vaudeville and a good grade of film service. Messrs. Toomey and Demarra, the owners, have made a big winner out of the Nickel, as they also have done with the Premier Theater, of Lawrence, which they own.

It is rumored that Floating Bridge Park, Lynn, Mass., has seen its last season, although Manager J. E. Chase had a good summer's trade

Mr. James E. Donovan, formerly manager of the Central Square Theater, Lynn, Mass., resigned to take a position with the Eastern Feature Film Company, of Boston. Mr. Donovan is a good worker, and one who knows his business.

Mr. Ray S. Averill opened his regular season at Poli's Theater, Waterbury, Conn., on Labor Day, and reports good business with vaudeville and pictures.

Fox's new theater, Waterbury, Conn , has been doing a large business ever since its opening show on August 28, as these columns have predicted. No expense was spared on Mr. William Fox's house, and it is considered one of the best in New England. The lobby is unusually large, being 240 feet deep and 30 feet wide, and is finished with tile flooring and stucco effect. Imitation marble walls and pillars also help the general appearance of this lobby. Mr. Fox himself was right on the job on the opening night, as was Mrs. Fox. Mr. Fox opened the theater, with its crowd of 2,000 people, with a very pleasing address of welcome. Mr. Harry Fitzgerald has been selected as resident manager of this house, which offers the regulation brand of Fox vaudeville and pictures. Up to date the invasion of Mr. Fox into the New England territory has been most satisfactory, as all the Fox houses are "cleaning up."

Mr. F. G. Spencer's Opera House, at St. John, Canada, has been closed lately, but will re-open in very short order.

Dr. J. C. Fairweather, associated with the Vitagraph Company, was in St. John, Can., last week, which event was immediately noted in the local paper, which carried an interview to the effect that the Vitagraph Company was very seriously considering the advisability of erecting a studio in St. John, and that Doctor Fairweather had been most favorably impressed, and was to make a distinctly favorable report.

At Brantford, Canada, the Opera House has re-opened for its season, and business is reported to be good, the Colonial, Gem and Apollo theaters, all of Brantford, are on the job, with the usual photoplay programs.

These columns have told how John Ellis, formerly a minister and ex-stock broker, carried off his daughter, Olga, and how Mrs. Ellis had moving pictures taken of her husband and child in Boston, which were sent all over this country, and also to foreign lands. The child and her father have been located at Tokio, Japan, according to a dispatch from Thomas Sammons, the United States Consul at Yokohama. The mother states that someone saw the film in Japan, and recognized her child! Who can say that the moving picture is not far-reaching!

September 4 saw the grand opening of Mr. William Fox's new theater at New Britain, Conn., which is named after its owner. The house is right flush up to the usual Fox standard, and seats 2,000. Manager Joseph Carr reports that the opening bill of pictures and vaudeville played to capacity business.

Mr. Jack Spurr, manager of the Regina Theater, at Regina, Sask., reports fine business. Jack is an old time show man, hailing from El Paso, Texas.

The Lyric Theater, Calgary, Canada, an old W. B. Sherman house, is now in the hands of the painters and decorators. After it has been completely remodeled, the Lyric will institute a policy of vaudeville and pictures.

Messrs. H. S. Smith and J. Morrison state that they are about to lease a number of theaters from Montreal to Vancouver, in which the policy will be four acts of vaudeville and four reels of pictures.

Mr. J. B. Harte reports excellent business at his Library Theater, Bennington, Vt. Ward's Opera House, of Bennington, is also controlled by Mr. Harte. Vaudeville and pictures alternate with road shows as the attractions.

The regular season of vaudeville and photoplays is now on at the Plaza Theater, at Bridgeport, Conn., with Mr. J. Cullom as the manager. The Plaza usually does very well.

The Cape Theater, at Cape Cottage, near Portland, Me., closed its season on Labor Day after a successful business with moving pictures.

The Orpheum Theater, Newburyport, Mass., had a sad career. After being closed all summer, it opened for the new season, only to be razed to the ground by fire, after only one performance. Worst of all, the Orpheum had opened to capacity trade.

It is rumored on good authority, that the Taylor Opera House, Danbury, Conn., which opened last week, with vaudeville and pictures, in opposition to the Empress Theater, has had enough of the vaudeville and will change the policy to straight pictures.

William Fox opened his theater in New Haven, Conn., on Monday. Business was good.

The activity of the film makers in exploiting such gems as "Quo Vadis?" "Les Miserables," "Pompeii," "Arizona," "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," and others of similar quality, has not been without effect on New England theaters, especially in the smaller towns. Many managers who formerly offered road shows, are now doing very nicely with these feature pictures.

The Colonial Theater, Pittsfield, Mass., has been unable to make its stock company attractions pay, which was predicted in these columns. Pictures will probably be installed at the Colonial, and such a policy should be successful.

For the present, at least, Mr. S. Z. Poli has decided to continue his theater at New Haven, Conn., as a stock company house, because of local conditions. All vaudeville and picture bookings have been canceled.

The Washington Theater, Boston, which has been closed for quite some time, due to alterations, is to be opened immediately. Two hundred additional seats have been installed, and the theater has been generally improved. Vaudeville and pictures are offered.

William Fox opened his new theater at New Britain, Conn., last week, to a capacity business. Every one of the 1,000 seats were taken. Mayor Holleran, of New Britain, addressed the audience, as did Mr. Fox. Prominent business men and city officials were especially invited guests. Six acts of vaudeville and six reels of Kinemacolor pictures make up the programs, with prices at 10, 15, 25 and 35 cents. The house is a beautiful affair, with every modern improvement. All floor space is carpeted. Ladies' parlors and such conveniences, were provided for. The walls and ceilings are of a dull pink finish, and lined with Italian marble wainscoting. The electrical effects are unique, and the decorations very artistic. Thirteen loge boxes, extending from the balcony, give the house a regal appearance. The lighting effect is particularly engaging. Throughout the auditorium, and in the center of the ceiling is a circular dome, with blue and pink figures. The exterior is fully up to the standard of merit prevailing inside, and shows many electric lights and torches. The house is bound to do business.

F. W. Winter, manager of the Grand Opera House and Empress Theater, Moncton, N. B., is at present in Canada, visiting Winnipeg, Edmonton and other cities. Mr. Winter states that while at Tette Jaune, he acquired an interest in a mica mine. The Eastern Amusement Company, in the Maratime provinces, has Mr. Winter as its president.

The work on the rebuilding of the Academy of Music, Haverhill, Mass., which was destroyed by fire in January, 1911, is now well under way. About $70,000 is being put into the theater, which will reopen with a seating capacity of 1,500. The house should be ready to open by October 1, and Mr. Fred Lovett, one of the best known New England managers, is to guide the theater. Manager Lovett leaves the Broadway Theater, Lawrence, Mass., to take hold of the new proposition. Henry Duncan, owner of the house, will co-operate with Mr. Lovett. Mr. Edward Cuddy has been secured as the treasurer of the Academy. Vaudeville and pictures will be the offerings.

Moxley Blumenberg, manager of the Casco Theater, Portland, Me., and president of the Maine State Branch of the Exhibitors' League, has acquired the Gloucester Theater, Gloucester, Mass., which he will run as a moving picture house, with Mr. Guy Woodman as local manager. Judging by the success of the Casco Theater, it is safe to predict that Mr. Blumenberg's new house will be a winner.

The Pastime and Majestic theaters, Old Orchard, Me., have rung down the curtain, after a very prosperous season of picture programs.

The Big Nickle Theater, Portland, Me., is being renovated, to the extent of a new front, and enlarged entrance. This the house badly needed. It is understood that the new improvements will give the Nickel the most attractive front of any Portland house.

Work on the New Empire Theater, Portland, is going on, and every effort is being made to secure an early opening for the house. It is stated that Dan Leader will manage this house.

The Pastime Theater, Lawrence, Mass., has outlived its usefulness, and is being remade into stores. It's "goodnight" to the store shows!

"Famed Granite Quarries," a local film, is being exhibited at the Lyceum Theater, Milford, Mass., to good business. The Ideal Theater is offering "Quo Vadis?" while talking pictures prevail at the Opera House.

Ernest Shipman, the well known Canadian theatrical man, has secured the Canadian franchise from Warner's Features, for three-reel Canadian releases on the regular Warner program.

London, Ont., Canada, is to have a new theater, to be owned by Mr John Griffin, of Toronto, the owner of twenty odd Canadian theaters. Mr. Griffin has signed a 50 years' lease for his London house. Work is now being started, and is to be built on a site with 140 feet frontage, and 110 feet depth. A seating capacity of 2,500 is provided for, and it is estimated that the theater will cost $150,000. Vaudeville and pictures to be the policy. Mr. Griffin's chain of theaters is a remarkably successful one, and he is adding to it frequently.

Manager Walter Linehan, of the Gilmore Theater, Springfield, Mass., has inaugurated Sunday concerts at his house, to consist of six reels of pictures and illustrated songs. The first Sunday concert was given on September 7, and business was excellent.

Dwight Gilmore, of Des Moines, Ia., a nephew of D. O. Gilmore, owner and manager of the Gilmore Theater, Springfield, Mass., is again at his post at this house, as it was found necessary to call him from Des Moines.

Messrs. A Paul Keith, E. F. Albee and H. L. Watkins, visited St. John, Can., on September 3, to inspect the new Imperial Theater, a new Keith house, which opened on September 19.

It is expected that Marcus Loew will lease the Central Square Theater, Lynn, Mass., as soon as alterations and repairs have been made.

Wm. E. Furber, manager of the Colonial Theater, at Haverhill, Mass., is doing nicely with vaudeville and Kinemacolor subjects.

Arthur E. Lord reports that "Les Miserables," which his concern is offering at Tremont Temple, Boston, is doing a very good business. Mr. Lord knows his business, and usually wins out.

September 9 saw the housewarming of the newly reorganized Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Massachusetts, at headquarters, on Lagrange street, Boston. It was simply a case of get together and be friendly, and Massachusetts exhibitors proved to be very good "mixers!" From eight o'clock until midnight, a rapid volley of moving pictures and vaudeville held forth, interrupted only by frequent pilgrimages to the long table, on which were to be found beverages of different kinds, to say nothing of salads, sandwiches and other "eats." The vaudeville was donated by the local theaters, with Victor Morris, of Loew's Boston houses, Jacob Lourie, of the Beacon, and Harry Wasserman, of the Eagle Theater, supplying most of the talent, not forgetting the Olympic. The various film exchanges supplied the pictures, but the General Film and Warner's Features donated the bulk of the photoplays. Pathe's Weekly, and Warner's "Theodora" came in for much favorable comment. The R. D. Marson Moving Picture Company donated the projecting machine, with the operator furnished by courtesy of the local union. Frank Howard, beloved by all New England film men, addressed the hundred odd exhibitors present in his usual inimitable way, much to everyone's delight. Mr. Ernest Horstman, president of the League, spoke in a sincere, convincing way, giving three reasons why the present organization had formed, after dissolving the old branch of the Exhibitors' League of America, as follows: A—The old State branch could not allow managers to join. This, the Massachusetts exhibitors do not like, as many managers have the interests of the business at heart, and should be admitted, to represent their theaters for the owners. B—Mr. Neff wants a State Board of Censorship, which we do not endorse. C—It is hardly worth while to pay a per capita tax of $2 to the big league, which is of very little benefit to us locally. Mr. Horstman also remarked that as the big organization was split in two, it is best to await developments. Lack of sustained interest, and failure to pay dues, were characterized by the president as the reasons for the failure of past leagues in Massachusetts. Among the prominent film men on the job we noted: Frank Howard, Ernest Horstman, J. A. Eslow, of the Universal program; Harry F. Campbell, of Warner's Features; Bert Bohannon (Nicholas Power Co.); F. A. Clark (Motiograph); Business Agent Franke (Operators' Union); Herman Rifkin (Eastern Feature Film Co.); J. Lourie, (Beacon); Alden Washburn (Unique; Harry Wasserman (Eagle); J. J. Cahill (McCue & Cahill); "Walter" Johnson (Empire, Chelsea), and many others. After the show the "regular old guard" ambled to the Eagle's Roost—but why go on —suffice it to say that all the "straw lids" went, after Alden Washburn started the game by smashing the World man's straw (we bear Alden no hard feelings though). Forgot to say that Joseph Mack, R. D. Marsan and Mr. "Simplex" Cowan were with us, and others too numerous to mention.

Miss Ida Gorfine, a Boston pianist of note, who played at the Beacon Theater for four years, died on September 8, of heart failure. Miss Gorfine's sudden death was a distinct shock to her many friends, and especially the employees of the Beacon. There was a large representation at the funeral, including Manager Jacob Lourie, of the Beacon.

The National Theater, Boston, opened its season on September 15, with a large program of vaudeville and pictures from the Mutual program. Manager Haley expects to do a large business at the National, which is a B. F. Keith theater. The same popular prices that prevailed last year are in force, with two performances to be given daily.

Moving pictures of Harry K. Thaw, and of various incidents in his fight for freedom were forbidden in Boston by Mayor John F. Fitzgerald. Permission was refused James H. Reid, the New York playwright, by the mayor on the grounds that Thaw's whole life made the exhibition of the pictures undesirable from a moral standpoint.

The Downtown Amusement Company, of 4 St. Mark's Place, New York, demonstrated their Talkaphone at the Worcester Theater, Worcester, Mass., on September 8 to 10. At the Casino Theater, New Bedford, Mass., on September 11 and 12, and at the Royal Theater, New Bedford, on September 13. It is said that these demonstrations attracted considerable favorable comment.

Mr. John J. Barry, Boston, who is to represent the Theatrical State Employees' Union at the A. F. of L. convention, at Seattle, was elected by the Boston Theatrical Stage Employees' Union as its delegate to the State Branch, A. F. of L. convention next week at Fall River, Mass.

Mr. Ashley, well known to New England exhibitors as formerly connected with the W. E. Greene Moving Picture Enterprises, has returned to the "game" after a long period of rest, by leasing the Music Hall at Quincy, Mass., where he will offer programs of vaudeville and pictures.

Mr. Herman Rifkin, manager of the Eastern Feature Film Exchange, 224 Tremont street, Boston, states that his latest feature is a three-reel production of Gaumont's, entitled "Who Killed George Lambert?" Mr. Rifkin reports brisk demand for this subject from New England exhibitors. The policy of this house is one new feature each week, and Mr. Rifkin has built up a large trade, due to his excellent judgment in buying features, and his policy of square dealing to all.

The Hodgdon Booking Agency, of 564 Washington street, Boston, has been incorporated, with Samuel Pollack, treasurer, and Carl Hutchins as the general manager. Mr. C. W. Hodgdon has given up his interests in the concern bearing his name, to devote his attention to his theater. New headquarters have been secured, at 32 Boylston street, where singers, illustrated songs and slides are to be had.

Business is reported as good at the New Dream Theater, Opera House Block, Houlton, Me., which recently opened with motion picture programs. This house is neat and has a good location. It seats about 400 persons.

LOUISVILLE.

THE success with which the Kleine-Cines production of "Quo Vadis?" met during its engagement of one week at the B. F. Keith Theater, in Louisville, was a revelation to those who have heretofore doubted the ability of the motion picture drama to draw in a manner at all comparable with that of a real success on the dramatic stage. The S. R. O. sign ws displayed several times during the engagement, and an extension of the fourteen performances scheduled, to include two more on Sunday, September 7, was found necessary to meet the demands of those who had not yet had an opportunity to see the big production.

A. C. Farrell, sales manager of the Central Film Service Company, of Indianapolis and Louisville, has returned from an extended visit in the East and to Chicago, where he has been investigating the latest equipment and accessories for his exchange.

The popularity of the various classic stories which have been produced on the film, and their educational value to those who, perhaps, would never learn them in any other way, are among the principal reasons why producers like them; and the success at the Novelty, in Louisville, of "Pelleas and Melisande," the big three reel Bison feature recently shown in Louisville, shows that the audiences at the popular Fourth Street house are no exception to the general rule. The Columbia had this feature after the Novelty, and it drew remarkably well at both houses.

The Orpheum, which is the leading house of the Princess Amusement Company's string, is being overhauled and redecorated in preparation for the big winter business. Judge W. Allen Kinney, who is the active head of the company since Irvin Simon went to Chicago, has his hands full nowadays with the numerous activities in which he is engaged, and with his big law practice, but finds time enough to do everything in shipshape. When the new house to be erected by the Henderson Amusement Company, at Henderson, Ky., which is to be called the Princess, is erected and in operation, the Louisville lawyer will have about all he can do.

So popular was "The Tigress," the big Itala feature which ran recently at the Novelty, that the management decided to run the film for a second time, and secured it for three days of the week of September 7. The Novelty management has added another musician to its orchestra, making this feature of its program as good as that of any show in the city.

Patrons of the Majestic are looking forward eagerly to the running of the next release of the Famous Players Company, which is to be shown next week, "The Scarlet Letter," being the play. "The Prisoner of Zenda" made such a hit that large houses may be counted upon hereafter whenever any of the multi-reel subjects produced by the Famous Players are shown at the Majestic.

Miss B. A. Plessinger, of the Independent Film Exchange, of Louisville, said recently that while express rates were doubtless reduced by the express companies September 1, in accordance with the recent order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, she has not been able to notice it to any extent in the bills paid on films shipped out to the various small towns in Kentucky and Tennessee to which the Independent service goes, the charges being apparently as large as ever. She has not tried the parcel post yet, but intimates that she may be compelled to, in order to cut the cost of deliveries down to a reasonable figure.

There is keen interest among Louisville moving picture men, from owners to operators, in the strike of operators in eight downtown houses in Indianapolis, after they had been refused an increase in pay from $18 to $25. The reported attempts made by the strikers to keep people out of the theaters affected to recall the situation which existed during a similar trouble in Louisville some time ago, although there was little trouble in the Falls City, whereas it seems that several clashes have occurred in the Indiana capital.

The approaching trial in the Shelbyville, Ky., police court of R. M. Brown, manager of the Music Hall motion picture theater, charged with violation of a city ordinance, is creating considerable interest in the little city. The charge is that he caused to be made "loud, unseemly and disturbing noises" by use of a combination, band, organ and piano—an orchestrion, in plain language—and while Mr. Brown ceased the operation of the machine at which the ordinance was directed, he operated it on Saturday night for the express purpose of making a test of the validity of the enactment. The penalty provided is a fine of not less than $5 nor more than $20 for each offense.

Alexander Brothers, of Cadiz, Ky., are proceeding with plans for the erection of a new motion picture house in that city. J. B. Alexander made a number of trips recently to various towns in order to get ideas for the new house, which the firm aims to make one of the most attractive in that part of the state, and it is announced that it will be modeled after the Rex Theater, in Hopkinsville, Ky. The lower floor will be for white people exclusively, an ample balcony being provided overhead, with a separate entrance, for colored people.

A site has been acquired, half of which, 26 feet wide, will be used for the theater, and it is hoped to have the house open for business by December 1.

Managers Thatcher and Waddle, of the Gem Theater, the popular motion picture house at Somerset, Ky., finding that the hot weather persisted unduly, have come to the front in behalf of their patrons with six more Westinghouse oscillating fans, which should keep patrons of the show comfortable until the unseasonable hot weather decides to give way to autumn temperatures.

The Princess Armory, in Ironton, O., across the river from Ashland, Ky., is being converted by Col. T. H. B. Jones, into a motion picture theater. It is reported that Manager Dick Wellman, of the Scenic Theater, is to have charge of the new house when it is completed. It is also reported in Ironton, that the purchasers of the Morris property at the corner of Center and Fourth Streets plan to erect a fine two-story building on the corner, to be used for store rooms, offices and a theater. The house, it is understood, will be built with a large balcony, and will otherwise be of the most modern type. The work of wrecking the buildings already on the lots is progressing rapidly, and the new building will start at once.

The Lyric Theater is the name of a new motion picture house which is to be a part of the large new building to be erected in Carlisle, Ky. Ground for the structure was broken on September 1, and work will be rushed on the building so as to complete it, if possible, before cold weather starts in.

Architect Anton Rieg, of Cincinnati, O., will receive bids soon on a motion picture house for M. Van Den Eynden and A. Kenne, to be built in that city on Tower Avenue. The building will cover 50 by 100 feet and will contain, in addition to the theater, two stories and several offices

The Alhambra Theater, on Fifth near Elm Street, in Cincinnati, O., is about to increase its seating capacity by about 450. Plans for the necessary changes have been drawn by Architect C. C. Taylor, and contracts will be let shortly.

The great Kinemacolor dramatization of Hawthorne's masterpiece, "The Scarlet Letter," drew crowds to the Majestic Theater, in Louisville, for the entire four days of its engagement.

The presentation of the great Kalem Biblical masterpiece, "From the Manger to the Cross," billed for the Shubert Masonic Theater for the week of September 22, will be one of the most successful film attractions ever shown in Louisville, from present indications. Two performances will be given daily, one in the afternoon, and one in the evening. The unprecedented success of "Quo Vadis?" the Kleine-Cines dramatization of the Sienkiewicz novel, showed that Louisville people will pay to see a high-class production, and it is hardly to be doubted that the Biblical theme will attract equal attention.

The Novelty Theater, which has first run on the Universal service, handled by the Central Film Service Company, of Louisville, has made arrangements with the company to use the Imp production of "Ivanhoe," for two days instead of one only, as usual.

The Parkland Airdome, which has had a very successful summer under the management of the Parkland Amusement Company, has closed on account of the cool weather which has prevailed for the past week, and the company announces its intention of building a permanent winter house in the thriving suburb from which the company gets its name.

The Leviton Amusement Company has recently opened its new house in Salem, Ind., which is showing to phenomenal business, according to Manager Leviton, who is in Louisville frequently on business.

R. L. Shrader, manager of the Central Film Service Company, at Louisville, has just completed a trip through Indiana and Kentucky in the interest of the company. He reports that the Universal program handled by the company is being shown in all of the better towns, and is making good with the public wherever it is used.

James Hague, of Eminence, Ky., recently purchased a Motiograph of the Harry K. Lucas Film Company, of Louisville, for use with a traveling show.

B. F. Fish, of Crab Orchard, Ky., is contemplating opening a picture show at that place. There is no regular theater there now, although a temporary show during the summer, for the entertainment of the guests at the hotel, was very much of a success, and gave Mr. Fish the idea that a permanent house might be a good thing.

C. A. Wheeler, of Broadhead, Ky., will open a new picture house at Bertha, Ky., in a short while. He is now making arrangements for a site, equipment, and so forth.

M. Switow, president of the Switow Amusement Company, of Louisville, has added another house to his string through Kentucky and Southern Indiana, having annexed the Garrick Theater, at Madisonville, Ky., recently. The building was erected in 1901, by W. C. Morton, at a cost of $35,000, and was formerly known as the Morton Theater. It will be run as heretofore, with moving pictures, vaudeville, and an occasional road company. Manager Bleich will probably remain in charge of the house for some time.

The contract has been awarded to F. J. Manley, of Lexington, Ky., to build a new business block in Carlisle, Ky., which will include several storerooms, rooms for the Masonic Lodge, and the new Lyric Theater. Daugherty Lodge, No. 65, F. and A. M., and Matters, Potts & Company, are the owners of the building.

J. L. Shrode, manager of the Rex Theater, in Hopkinsville, Ky., left the city recently on a two weeks' tour of the larger Eastern cities, in search of new ideas in the operation of his house, which he is determined to make as good as the best. He will visit the offices of the producing companies and otherwise endeavor to get in touch with the leading lights in the business.

Manager Venable, of the Princess Theater, of Hopkinsville, Ky., recently closed a contract for a four-piece orchestra, composed of musicians of ability, to take care of that end of his program, and the new feature has made a hit with his patrons. The orchestra consists of a piano, cornet, violin and drums.

Plans have been completed for two days of road work in the vicinity of Paducah, Ky., by all of the able-bodied citizens in that part of the country, after the manner of the good roads day recently held in Kansas and Missouri, and those in charge of the work will have moving pictures taken of the road-makers, in order that they may subsequently see themselves as they labored. October 9 and 10 are the dates.

S. P. Pool, of Princeton, Ky., has purchased of R. M. Dunn, the Rex Theater, in that city, and will continue to operate the house.

ILLINOIS.

THE "stock company all fair week at the Opera House," is being replaced in many instances in Illinois by the picture shows. In years gone by the amusement-hungry small-town residents would feast for six nights upon a mixed bill of melodrama and comedy, but now it palls when compared with a good film service. Most of the managers are running multiple reel features as an extra inducement.

Foresighted and broadminded trustees of the Christian church at Chandlerville have just dedicated a new building which has been wired for the reception of a moving picture machine. Although the finances are not in a condition for this necessary adjunct to thorough church work, it was realized that it would soon be installed and provision was made for it.

J. F. Tyrrell has sold the Majestic theater at Paris to Wilbur J. Menke, proprietor of the Waldorf Smoke House, who has taken possession of it.

The International Film Trade Association, of Chicago, has been incorporated, with a capital stock of $10,000, to do a general merchandise business. The incorporators are George S. Foster, Albert B. Dunning and J. A. Garrett.

The Temple Theater Company, of Quincy, has been incorporated, with a capital stock of $5,000, to do a general amusement business. The incorporators are T. Leslie Bradbury, R. A. Byrd and Clarence C. Goins.

The photoplay house at Lockport was without electric service one night recently when the Sanitary District cut off its service to the city following a row with municipal officials.

A free picture show was given to the teachers of Madison County when they met for their annual institute meeting at Edwardsville.

The Popular Amusement Co. of Chicago, Ill., has been incorporated, with a capital stock of $50,000. The incorporators are: Frederick Limouze, George F. Q. Johnson and Mary Shannon.

The Colonial theater at Danville recently gave a benefit for the Degree of Pocahontas Lodge, at which films of the Fourth-of-July sham battle in that city were shown.

The Joliet theater at Joliet has added Miss Peggy Daugherty, a soprano singer, as an attraction.

The City Council at Quincy has decided to regulate the moving picture theaters, and a resolution was offered by Alderman Hummert and Disseler, asking that a board of supervision be created, whose duty shall be to investigate the character of every film produced in the city. A number of exhibitors attended a session of the council, and William A. Schwindeler announced on behalf of the managers that none of them desired to offer any objectionable films and that from the synopsis furnished by the producers they were fairly able to censure the reels. The managers have asked that they be allowed to hold a conference with the ordinance committee of the council before any drastic and ill-advised action is taken

The Hippodrome Garden theater at McHenry has been closed.

Hugh Crowell has purchased the property of the Lyric theater at Carbondale and has reopened the place. Five reels of pictures are now being run.

S. T. Herman has sold his Globe theater at Monticello to Harry Plunk.

The Orpheum theater at Carthage has been sold to the American Theater Company.

Glen Corley is now associated with his brother in the moving picture business at Rantoul

Kinemacolor pictures have been added to the program at the Fox Theater, in Aurora, by Managers Rubens and Thielen.

Friends in Illinois have received word from Harry Wicker that he has sold the World's Theater, at Gilroy, Cal., to F. C. Malkmis, of San Jose, Cal.

Walter Gerrib has sold the Ark Theater at Westville, to Mr. and Mrs. John Possolt, of that city. The house will be continued as a five cent photoplay theater, giving a three-reel show. The Misses Bertha and Gertrude Possolt will manage it. On the opening night, under the new management, all in attendance were presented with asters and roses.

The Majestic Theater, at East St. Louis, has been leased by the Interstate Theatrical Company, to O. E. Laumann and G. H. Muehling, of St. Louis. The policy of the new house will be to feature pictures. They will run six reels a day, changing daily. Ten cents will be secured for any part of the house. Laumann, who will be the local manager, has spent the last seven years at the Olympia Theater, in London.

R. S. Hopper, manager of the Lyric Theater, at Freeport, has purchased the Lyric Theater in Fond du Lac, Wis. He will place a brother in charge.

Citizens of Heyworth have decided to erect an opera house. Col. C. F. Rolofson has been elected chairman.

The photoplay houses in Joliet, are competing on the music question. Three of them now have pipe organs, and the Joliet Theater has added a violin and cello, and now has a three-piece orchestra

George Slothower has been made manager of the Family Theater at Dixon. The house is showing three reels of pictures, with two vaudeville acts.

Dreamland Theater, at Galena, recently put on a novel local attraction, at which Paul Kerz delivered an illustrated lecture, using forty slides to show the needs of that city, and especially the demand for a new city hall.

Pictures taken at Mt. Carmel, and at Harrisburg recently proved a good attraction at the Colonial Theater in Mt. Carmel.

It is reported that L. W. Guiteau, of Freeport, has been negotiating for the purchase of the equipment of the Rex Theater, which was formerly operated in South Main street, in Rockford, with a view to opening a picture show in some town near Freeport, presumably Stockton.

The Majestic Theater, at Rockford, has announced that for its Sunday program, it will give five reels of pictures: dramatic, scenic, educational and comedy pictures.

The National Association of Press Humorists, in convention at Peoria, were filmed when they went for a frolic to Oglehurst, the country estate of former Lieutenant Governor John G. Oglesby, at Elkhart.

The Washington Theater, at Belleville, gave prizes of an annual, a six months', and a three months' pass to winners in a contest for the best kept lawns in the city, which was conducted as a part of a civic beautification movement.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

COOLER weather, and the cessation of outdoor attractions, has brought the hoped-for revival of business among Springfield photoplay houses. Local managers feel assured that with the multiple-reel pictures among the regular releases, the winter business will be better than ever before. But some of the houses that are engaged in the warmest kind of competition are not relying on their regular programs. Gus Kerasotes, of the Royal, has a liking for big business at the week-end, and books in most of his extra features for Saturday and Sunday. The Amuse-U, the licensed house on North Sixth street, has been using Warner's Features for the week-end. Some extraordinarily long shows are being given in Springfield for a nickel, and some well-mixed programs are being given. Strangely enough, no talking pictures have been exhibited in Springfield, and the booking of the Majestic, the local Orpheum vaudeville house, is likely to be the first. This is more unusual, because of the fact that half the small cities in Illinois have played them and even the showboats of the western rivers have picked them up for an attraction, showing often at places where there is nothing but a boat-landing.

The International Harvester Company's feature picture, "The Dawn of Plenty," was on the program at the annual meeting of the Sangamon County Teachers' Institute in this city.

Art Simons, who was on the road for "From the Manger to the Cross," has taken out a set of "The Last Days of Pompeii," for the Central Feature Film Company, in place of Leo Williams.

The Airdome in South Fourth street, closed down until September 15.

Rumors have reached Springfield that one of the companies incorporated recently at Danville, has been scouting around for a site for a new picture house in Springfield.

W. W. Watts, of the Vaudette Amusement Company, cashed in on the suspended interest of the public in the "Mary" series recently at his Chicago house, the Vaudette. He ran the first eleven in rapid succession, then withheld the last one for a week, during which he advertised it well. The result was he had crowds standing on the walk waiting to get in.

Walter W. Evans, Jr., of the Kinetograph sales department of Thomas A. Edison, Inc., was a visitor at local picture houses.

The Vaudette Amusement Company has again placed "From the Manger to the Cross" on the road.

I. A. Burnstein, owner of the Capitol and Amuse-U theaters, in this city, was recently in Normal, looking over the field with a view to opening a picture house there.

VITAGRAPH.

ANN OF THE TRAILS (Oct 6).—Although keeping herself above her environment, Ann Morgan is used by her father as "bait" in his gambling den. One day Ann plays cards with Al Brent. She plays a straight game much to the disgust of Morgan, and Brent wins. Morgan, angry, takes her place and by cheating wins all of Brent's money. Ann, ashamed of her fatuer, accuses him. A fight follows. Morgan, though mortally wounded, makes his getaway with Ann and they finally find their way to a mountain cabin where they are both welcomed by Norwood. Morgan dies shortly afterwards and Norwood asks Ann to marry him. She consents. All goes well until one day Brent happens into town and comes in contact with Norwood, who is filling his pipe from a pouch which had belonged to Ann before her marriage and which Brent recognizes as one belonging to him. He tells Norwood. Norwood attacks him and then rushes home to his wife and asks her if it is true—if she was the "woman of the town saloon." Her silence makes him think it is true and he rushes out of the cabin to leave her. Brent finding out what he has done goes to Norwood's cabin and finds Ann lying senseless on the floor.

He summons a doctor and together they restore her to consciousness. Norwood turns back and once more comes to his shack, where he is convinced by both Brent and the doctor that his wife is not the kind of woman he had suspected and no better woman ever lived. Norwood asks his wife's forgiveness and their happiness is complete in the advent of their first born.

A HOMESPUN TRAGEDY (Oct. 7).—Although deeply in love with his wife, Dorothy, Mr. Thomson's jealousy is aroused by her attentions to his son. Dorothy herself is unconscious of this since she is only trying to help her stepson.

Things gradually go from bad to worse until one morning at breakfast Jack, the stepson, shows too plainly the effects of the "night before." Thomson's temper gets the better of him and he orders Jack out of the house. Jack, having no better place to go, finds his way to the tavern, where he indulged in his own pleasures. He loses in cards, and in his half-intoxicated state gets mixed up in a brawl, which results in his shooting the owner of the tavern. Overcome with terror, he flees to his stepmother, and begs her to help him. Having no money of her own, it is necessary for her to steal it from her husband, which she unwillingly does. Thomson discovers her, accuses her, in his anger, of duplicity, and of being in love with his son. She says nothing. Thomson packs his grip and prepares to leave. About the same time Jack has been overtaken and mortally wounded by the posse, which has been searching for him. Thomson comes upon him and Jack confesses all, begging his father to forgive him. Thomson, seeing everything now, and realizing how unjust he has been to his wife, returns and begs her forgiveness, which is readily given.

WHEN FRIENDSHIP CEASES (Oct. 8).—Sandy and Shorty wander into the country, where, happy, though hungry, they are fed and set to work by an old farmer, whose old maid daughter carries on a furious flirtation with them both, much to the dismay and alarm of Silas, the hired man, who is her old-time sweetheart. Through the woman's wiles Sandy and Shorty's long friendship ends, until at length a challenge to fight is given and accepted—and they fought behind the barn.

Silas, feeling that he has been supplemented by the two rivals, goes into the barn to die by slow strangulation at the end of a rope; leaving a note to Gwendoline acquainting her with his intentions. She finds the note, goes to his rescue and declares she loves him and him alone. At length, battered and bruised, Sandy and Shorty, still snarling and glaring at each other, fall exhausted, side by side, to the ground. They call wildly for their lady-love to soothe their fevered brows and aching bodies, only to learn that she has eloped with her old-time sweetheart, Silas.

HEARTBROKEN SHEP (Oct. 9).—Brought into contact with each other, Runa and Shep, a dog, become great chums. Their companionship is looked upon with evident interest and amusement by Runa's parents, who do not seem to be very greatly concerned for their daughter's childish affairs, leaving that entirely to her nurse.

One day the parents go away. The nurse, after having put Runa in her bed, goes downstairs, and there begins to carry on a flirtation with the tinsmith, who is working on the roof. The tinsmith greatly interested, comes down and joins Runa and they go off for a walk, the tinsmith ignorant that he spilled some live coals from his fire pot before he left the roof. Shep, sleeping in the yard, discovers the smoke, and running to the firehouse, leads the firemen back and guides them into Runa's room. Here, by some accident, Shep is shut in. He tries vainly to get out of the room. Finally he succeeds, by way of a ladder, in getting to the window and getting into Runa's room, and trys to drag her out of danger.

As Runa is carried from the blazing house her parents arrive. Amazed at seeing the house in flames, they run to ascertain Runa's safety. This having been satisfactorily accomplished, their attention is attracted to Shep. They call him, but he does not respond. Runa calls and Shep jumps from the window. When he reaches the ground he is fatally hurt, and dies—a hero.

CUTEY'S WATERLOO (Oct. 10).—This time Cutey gets his good and proper. He goes to a country town to fill a position as clerk in a grocery store. On his daily trips to the outlying farms, he becomes interested in Ethel Moore, a farmer's daughter. They finally become engaged. Shortly after, Mary Burton, the grocer's daughter, comes home from school, and Wallie at once shows marked attentions to the fascinating Mary, who in turn, shows a liking for him. His neglect of Ethel, causes her to look into the matter, and she discovers the reason. She resolves to fix Wallie, and, dressed in her brother's clothes, she wins Mary from him. Wallie, having been turned down by Mary, decides to go back to Ethel, and phones her mother to tell Ethel he will be out to see her that evening. Ethel, standing outside the door, hears it all and discloses her identity to Mary, who, though indignant at first, agrees to help Ethel to teach Cutie a good lesson. When Wallie arrives at the farm he finds that Ethel has a new fellow (who is Mary, dressed in some of Ethel's brother's clothes). Ethel returns Wallie's ring and dismisses him. A day or so later, hearing that Wallie is going to leave, the girls determine to give him a good send-off. They dress up in their male attire, and going down to the station, present him with a large "bouquet" on which is a tag, "Bon Voyage," from Ethel and Mary. Wallie is unable to make it out until the girls remove their hats and shake down their hair, much to his consternation. Wallie makes a flying leap for the train and gets out of their sight as quickly as he can.

THE TEST (Special—2 parts—Oct. 11).—Having put his practice before everything else, Richard Anstruther, an army physician, has somewhat neglected his wife, who, because of this, drifts into a flirtation with Larry Gordon, one of Anstruther's brother officers. Unwilling to expose his wife to the climatic conditions of South Africa, whence he has been ordered, Anstruther charges Gordon to watch over and protect her while he is away. This Gordon says he will do, but nevertheless, takes every opportunity to poison Eleanor's mind against her husband.

Some time after reaching Africa, Anstruther sends for his wife, who is only too glad to come. By curious coincidence, she and Gordon, who has also been ordered down, take the same boat. Gordon, taking full advantage of his opportunity, endeavors to make Eleanor more and more suspicious of her husband. At the Guards' Ball, affairs come to a climax when Anstruther sees his wife in Gordon's arms.

Anstruther, on his way to the smoking room in the barracks, is told of the fresh fever out-break in a nearby town.

After the ball, Anstruther leaves his wife alone with Gordon. Later, coming home, he finds Gordon alone and sees a way to let fate settle the score between them. After telling Gordon of the plague-stricken district, he places a pack of cards on the table and tells him that by cutting the cards they shall decide which shall go. Anstruther wins. Gordon, nearly prostrated with fear, hunts up Eleanor to say goodbye. While they are together, a note comes from Anstruther for Eleanor, telling her that he was simply testing Gordon's nerve, and he is satisfied that he is a coward; that he himself intends to go into the fever town, thinking that better than life without her love. Eleanor, at last realizing Gordon's cowardice, disguises herself as a native, and sets out after her husband. She finds him, desperately ill. She nurses him back to life, convincing him of her true love for him, and they are happy in the realization that it is mutual.

GEORGE KLEINE.

FOR HIS BROTHER'S CRIME (Special—Sept. 22—2 parts).—George and John Bronson are brothers, very poor and in love with Maude Meriden. George proposes to Maude, but is told by her mother that he cannot marry her until he has obtained a position. John secures employment as a butler in the home of Mr. Parsons, and says nothing of his love for Maude. George, meantime, departs from the straight and narrow path and plunges into a life of dissipation. His money gone, burglary is the next step. One night George climbs into the window of the Parsons home, quite unaware that his brother is employed there. In cracking the safe, he manages to get th big door part way open, when turning, he finds himself face to face with his brother, John. Taking to his heels, he flees. John instantly draws open the safe door, and at that second there is a blinding flash, followed by the appearance of Mr. Parsons and the other members of the household. Taking a camera from a hidden recess in the safe, Mr. Parsons confronts John with his photograph. On this evidence of theft John is sent to prison. Here he passes six years of a ten year sentence.

Meanwhile, George, having made a rich haul, pulls himself together and comes back to claim Maude Meriden. The couple are married and are living happily. One day, when John is being transferred to another prison, he leaps from the train, and in his convict garb, with his hands manacled together, creeps into a blacksmith's shop. His pleadings warm the stolid opposition of the blacksmith until the latter finally cuts away the handcuffs. Some weeks later John makes his way to his brother's home, confronts him with his wife present, and denounces him as the real thief. Detectives are called and in the ensuing excitement, John shoots, and seriously wounds his brother, George. John is then taken away and tried for the shooting affray, as well as his escape from prison.

Realizing that death is close at hand, George writes a letter in which he confesses the original theft, and the fact that he has been masquerading as a gentleman, while his brother, John, has suffered in prison. This letter he gives to his wife which succeeds in freeing John. One year later John asks Maude to become his wife.

ESSANAY.

A MATTER OF DRESS (Oct. 7).—Mabel Lane, a plain country girl, goes to visit her friend, Virginia, in the city and while there Virginia sees that Mabel's hair is becomingly dressed and lends her some of her own pretty gowns. Mabel creates quite a sensation and receives a proposal from the "catch of the season." She tells her suitor to come to see her at her country home, and to test his affection, does her hair up in curl papers and puts on a gingham apron over a plain dress to receive him. When he sees her, the man hurriedly excuses himself. She is not heart-broken at his going, however, as she discovers her country beau is really the man she loves.

DAD'S INSANITY (Oct. 8).—Dad answers the advertisement of a rich young widow who wishes to marry, but when she calls on him he does not like her appearance and pretends insanity in order to get rid of her. He is taken to a sanitarium. The widow, however, was only "made up" to look old and homely, and when she removes her disguise, the son immediately falls in love. He calls a minister and they are about to be married when dad, who has escaped from the sanitarium, comes in bringing with him a newspaper man. The widow and reporter recognize in each other a childhood sweetheart, and leaving the dumbfounded father and son, take the minister and go off to be married.

LOVE AND THE LAW (Oct 9).—Ruth is loved by the sheriff, his deputy, Ted Magee, and "Rhino Bill," three ranchmen. Ted is the lucky suitor and when each of the other three discovers this fact, he vows vengeance on Magee. "Rhino" finally quarrel with Ted, and in the scuffle the bully is shot in the arm. The sheriff and his deputy are hot on Ted's trail. He goes to Ruth's home and the girl hides him when she sees the sheriff and his assistant coming. While at the house, the sheriff and deputy each discovers that the other is in love with Ruth, and while they are fighting it out, Ted and the girl escape across the border.

BRONCHO BILLY'S OATH (Oct. 11).—In order to save his friend's life, Broncho Billy holds up the stage and takes money enough to pay the doctor. Jim Hart recovers and accidentally learns what Broncho has done for him, as he is about to pay back the amount stolen. Some time later, Broncho Billy becomes engaged to Geraldine, and Jim, in a jealous rage, informs the sheriff of the hold-up. Broncho Billy is arrested, but swears revenge on Jim. He manages to escape and in going back to the cabin to fulfill his oath, is followed by the sheriff. A bullet from the sheriff's gun meant for Broncho Billy, enters the window and kills Jim.

DEAR OLD GIRL (Special—2 parts—Oct. 10).—Ted Warren and Dora Allen were engaged to be married, and Ted, who is a student at Cornell, wishes to have the ceremony take place at his Fraternity House on the day of his graduation. His sweetheart lives in his home town, which is a day's journey from the college, and a short while before graduation he takes the trip to visit his father and arrange with Dora and her parents about the wedding. After a few happy days spent with his fiancee he goes back to college, there to await with impatience the coming of that happiest of days which is to bring him his beloved bride and well earned degree. The day before he receives a telegram from Dora stating that she and her partents are leaving with Ted's father in his private car and will arrive at the college town in the morning. The next day as the university chimes ring out over the campus to the sweet melody of "Dear Old Girl," Ted and three of his friends prepare to go to the train, Ted taking with him an immense bouquet of white flowers to present to his bride. A few minutes after the boys arrive at the station they are shown a telegram stating that Mr. Warren's special car traveling at high speed, had been derailed and the entire party killed. Ted, unable to bear up under the frightful blow, is taken back to the fraternity house by his friends.

Prematurely aged by the shock, and his mind unbalanced, Ted prepares every day at the ringing of the college chimes to meet his fiancee. His sympathetic friends, out of pity, humor him by taking him to the railroad station. After many such trips, the boy again breaks down and is ordered to bed by a physician. His faithful old colored servant is heartbroken at the change in his young master, and watches over him with ever loving care and devotion. The chimes again call Ted, and eluding old Jim he goes once more to meet the train. He hears the engine whistle in the distance, and in his eagerness, runs down the track toward the oncoming train.

When the servant finds his charge gone, he is alarmed, and calling Ted's friends they go in search of him. They find the boy barely alive, lying in a ditch alongside of the tracks. Tenderly, and with sorrow in their hearts, they take him back to the house and put him to bed. The spirit and the mind were already broken, and now the poor worn-out and maimed body is ready to give up the struggle. The going is eased by the spirit of the bride coming to greet him at the beginning of the long journey.

LUBIN.

THE COUNTERFEITERS' FATE (Oct. 6).—Dick Blank, a mountain ranger, is instructed by his chief to go into the mountains to look for counterfeiters. Arriving at the lonely peek called Mt. Oro, he comes in contact with Mary Meadows, a mountain maid. He also meets a notorious character called "The Parson," so named on account of his peculiar and eccentric dress. He in reality is the leader of the counterfeiters. The ranger perceives and after leaving a note for the mountain lass, he departs on the trail of "The Parson." "The Parson" and his henchman capture him and an insane hunchback attempts to blow him up with powder, but the mountain maid, who is fascinated by the good-natured stranger, arrives in time to save him. The bad men pay the penalty and Blank and the mountain maid after a short courtship get married.

THE TWO COWARDS (Oct. 7).—Joe Wilkins and Jim Foster are partners in business. Joe is big and robust physically. Jim is the opposite. They love Constance Hope. Both men head the Commercial Trust Company and nothing comes up to mar their friendship until one day they both meet Constance on the street. She and Jim walk off together, while Joe goes to fulfill a business engagement. Joe finds Jim has the papers he wants and starts back for them.

Meanwhile Jim and Constance have come upon a bully who is ill-treating a newsboy. Constance is incensed and expected Jim to interfere and he makes a weak pretense. Joe, however, coming along lays the bully out with a few well directed punches. Constance turns Jim down, refusing to marry a man who is a coward. Joe takes advantage of the situation and wins from Constance a promise to let him know how she feels toward his suit. The affairs of the trust company become involved and the partners see ruin and disgrace staring them in the face. Joe shows his cowardice by saving what he has and decamping, leaving Jim to fight the battle alone. A rumor of their insolvency precipitates matters and the morning sees the run on the company in full swing. Jim sacrifices everything he has, but to no avail. Joe, meanwhile, has gone to where Constance is in the country and tries to get her to elope. She is almost persuaded when she sees the headline of a paper sticking from his pocket. She eventually gets the truth from him and rebukes him for his moral cowardice in leaving his partner to face the trouble alone. Telling him he is a worse coward than Jim she dismisses him. Constance, returning from the country, finds the effects of Jim being auctioned off. She finds him in a poor office, surrounded by second-hand furniture. He is astounded that she should come to him and cannot believe it when she takes his hand and tells him he is a brave man. He gains new courage and asks her if he can hope, providing he regains his financial stability. Constance shows him that she does not mean to wait, but wants to fight with him.

BREED OF THE NORTH (Special—2 parts—Oct. 9).—John and Jim, twin brothers, are in love with Molly. Jim and Molly have been married, while John, now a beared woodsman, joins the North West Mounted Police. Jim gambles and goes to Jackson's shack. Nelson, a half breed with a grudge against Jackson, follows. Jim realizes he is being cheated and grapples with Jackson. Jim's revolver is discharged in the air. The half-breed fires through the window at the same time. Jim tells Molly he will get across the border into the states and will send for her. Nelson leads a posse to the shack, the crime is discovered and the blame put upon Jim. John, up in the woods, together with Phillips, another officer, is notified to look for the murderer. Both officers take different routes. John hits Jim's trail and for days the chase goes on. John catches up with Jim, and shoots. Jim drops behind a boulder. The battle continues until Jim has but one shot left. When John shoots again Jim staggers and falls flat on his face. John hesitates, fearing a trick. Finally Jim turns quickly and shooting from the ground drops his brother, then speeds for the woods. John binds the wound (in his arm) and staggers after the other. Jim falls beside a stream and madly drinks of the water. John is about to pull the trigger when he falls unconscious. Jim, dazed, looks at the fallen body. He takes John's revolver without touching his body, which is face down. Phillips, discovering he is on the wrong trail, starts to retrace his steps and finally hits the right road. Jim returns and John comes to. He crawls to Jim and the two fight, John getting Jim's throat between his fingers. Then he realizes it is his brother. When Jim tells him he was to meet Molly and they could get over the line should he get away, pity gives way and he tells Jim he will take his place. Jim remonstrates, but John insists and starts shaving with water and his hunting knife. Then they change clothes. When Phillips arrives he admits he is the man he is looking for. Phillips binds up his wound and they leave. In the jail Molly discovers that it is John and not Jim they have caught. Jim realizes he must [illegible] his brother, gain admission to his cell, change clothes and await the outcome. Molly suspects the half-breed. She tells of her suspicions and John decides to put the half-breed through the third degree. The latter has been drinking heavily and John, with a cloak covering his uniform, goes to the half-breed's shack. The drunken half-breed breaks down confessing. John takes the half-breed to jail. In the light the half-breed sees he is at the hands of an officer. John takes the half-breed with witnesses to Jim's cell and there he [illegible] the confession. Molly is admitted and told that her husband will soon be free.

THE DRUMMER'S NARROW ESCAPE (Oct. 10).—Walter Wilson, a traveling man, arrives in the village of Mt. Pleasant. While he is talking to the proprietor of the hotel, he sees the charming daughter of Abner Peabody passing on her way to the store. He is attracted and asks the proprietor to introduce him. This is done and Bess, the daughter, merrily trips on her way. Walter walks over to the store and assists Bess with her basket of groceries to the cross roads. Here she tells him he must leave her, which he does after arranging another meeting. Bess returns to the house and tells her older sister, Priscilla, of the fine young man she has met. Priscilla, anxious to meet most any young man as she is getting to the shelving age, decides to pass the hotel and see if she cannot attract Walt's attention. Walt is seated in front of the hotel when Priscilla arrives on the scene. She does not make a hit and goes off disgruntled. The following day Walt passes the Peabody residence, bumps into Priscilla and she throws a fake faint. The father sees her in Walt's arms and thinks he is a suitor. That afternoon when he receives a note from Walt asking permission to call and be a suitor for his daughter's hand, he, thinking it means Priscilla, willingly consents. Walt calls and the old man meets him, and being anxious to get Priscilla off his hands he leaves Walt while he goes to tell her. Walt waits in anticipation and when a female hand is placed in his he is thrilled, but on turning around and seeing who it is he beats it, with Priscilla and her father in pursuit. Bess sees the chase from the porch and follows. They catch Walt at the edge of the woods. Explanations are made and when the old man looks Priscilla over he with a suggestive wink declares that he cannot blame Walt, and a good laugh is enjoyed by all at Priscilla's expense.

GOING HOME TO MOTHER (Oct. 10).—Will Black gets up late and his hurried dressing leaves him in a bad temper. The morning mail brings only a bunch of Nell's bills, and he goes up in the air. Nell declares that she will go home to her dear mother and Will dares her to. He gives her the money for railroad fare and leaves. Down at the office he cannot work, and sadly he returns to the deserted home. He has not the heart to enter, but sits on the steps in deep dejection. Meantime, Nell has fallen for the lure of the shop windows and by the time she reaches the station she has spent every cent, so she goes home and she and Will forgive each other.

THE HIGHER LAW (Oct. 11).—Clara Clayton, wife of the district attorney, is vain, selfish and extravagant. She secretly runs into debt, particularly to Kate Davis, a poor dressmaker, to whom she owes $500. Kate, a widow, is in desperate need of money to pay for an operation on her invalid child, and Clara promises she shall have it in time. She does, however, succeed in scraping the amount together. Clara yields to a selfish impulse and spends the money for a necklace while returning from the railway station where she has said good-bye to her husband, who is leaving for a long vacation. Chance places the new bought necklace in Kate's hands, and, feeling that she is doing no wrong, the widow pawns it, sending the money to the hospital to pay for the operation. Clara is furious, and urges the assistant district attorney to press a charge of grand larceny against Kate, and he, thinking that his chief will be delighted, prepares the case. As Kate has frankly confessed, there is no doubt of her conviction. Returning home upon the day set for the trial, Clayton learns all the facts in the case and is filled with bitterness. He sees but one chance to right the wrong his wife has done. He telegraphs his resignation as district attorney and to the amazement of the court offers his services to Kate as attorney for the defense. Clayton defends the case. On the facts, Kate must be found guilty, but is sentenced to but one minute's imprisonment in the judge's private office. The humbled and repentant Clara begs and receives Kate's forgive

BIOGRAPH.

HIS SECRET (Oct. 6).—At the end of his resources in an unkind world, it was perhaps natural that he should believe society and even his wife were against him. The story relates how at the crucial moment, he gave up the struggle, but was saved by the presence of his wife, who came, a messenger of kindness.

SO RUNS THE WAY (Oct. 11).—The young wife only reflected her aspiring mother's teaching. Her one ambition seemed to be for display and to keep her reputation as a woman of fashion. The husband's first weakness in fearing to tell her that the source of her power had gone, resulted in a second, a near theft, nevertheless incriminating. Through it came the lesson.

NEVER KNOWN TO SMILE (Oct. 8).—O'Brien's wife was a frigid old crab. She had never been known to laugh. He decided to buy the old girl a new hat. Perhaps she might crack a smile. He sent it home by messenger. A street fight took place. For the first time in her life Mrs. O'Brien laughed, but presto, she learned that hat was her own.

SCENTING A TERRIBLE CRIME (Oct. 8).—Katrina decided to make some good old "kraut" as a surprise to her husband, "Frenchy." They went off for a month's vacation. Monsieur returned early. He issued forth from his apartment with a dull knife to sharpen. The smell of the seasoned "kraut" confronted the neighbors. The coroner, cops and undertaker arrived, but it took the German coroner to settle it.

A TENDER-HEARTED CROOK (Oct. 2).—The girl decided after what happened at the garden party that she did not want his love any longer, but could not live without it. She decided to leave this world. Her unexpected caller had something to say about that. He did not have to read "Sarah Hardcrab's Advice to the Lovelorn" to know what to do. Being a very human and sensible person, he brought two young people together in his own original way.

THE CHIEFTAIN'S SONS (Oct. 4).—Tai-Oh was favored by the tribe as their next leader. Now Ko-Id-Deh had long since sought to take his place. Thus Tai-Oh, as one sleeping, drifted down the dark waters of the river in his fast-filling canoe. But he returned and Ko-Id-Deh slept with his fathers, the vengeance of Tai-Oh complete. Then Tai-Oh went back to the maid, who had taught him the way of peace.

PATHEPLAY.

PATHE'S WEEKLY, NO 52 (Sept. 22).—Koenigsberg, Germany.—The aviators of the northeast of Germany demonstrate their efficiency to officials of the aviation department of army.

Chicago, Ill.—The Gymkana and Beach tournament of the South Shore Country Club, attracts a number of expert equestrians, and the opening event, the watermelon race, is a difficult and amusing test of their ability.

New York, N. Y.—Prince Albert of Monaco, proprietor of the famous Monte Carlo Casino, on his way to the Rockies to hunt big game, arrives in his palatial yacht, "Hirondelle."

Baltimore, Md.—Mayor Preston and the National Guard march in honor of the heroes of the American wars on "Old Defenders' Day," a Maryland state holiday.

Toppenish, Wash.—A fine program of thrilling competitions is arranged for the annual Indian Fair and Round-Up at this city.

New York, N. Y.—Coney Island, the World's greatest amusement resort, closes its season with the usual Mardi Gras.

Wiley, Ohio.—A Pennsylvania passenger train is ditched by a spreading rail near this city, and 35 persons are injured, but no one is killed, owing to the use of steel cars.

Belleville, N. J.—The corner-stone of St. Peter's Church is laid and blessed by Bishop O'Connor, of Newark.

Charleston, W. Va.—William Jennings Bryan, Secretary of State, sidesteps the onerous duties of his office to appear as a headliner in an itinerant tent Chautauqua, dividing the bill with yodelers, jugglers, etc., and splitting the profits with the proprietor.

LILLIE'S NIGHTMARE (Sept. 30).—Lillie had always longed to know a real, true, dyed-in-the-wool Indian, who would make the sort of forceful lover she had read about, and when Red Cloud, the son of a Cherokee chief, came to board at her mother's house during his vacation from college Lillie's joy knew no bounds. That afternoon Lillie took a nap and dreamed she was the bride of Red Cloud, who took her to live with his tribe. The dream was in reality a nightmare and it scared Lillie so thoroughly that she was convinced that she was never born to be a squaw.

THE DESCHUTES CANYON—Washington (Sept. 30).—An interesting tour through Washington into Oregon, following the Deschutes river where it has worn its way through solid rock until two walls of stone tower on its shores, leaving an awe inspiring picture of rugged mountain beauty.

OXYGEN (Oct. 1).—The air we breathe contains twenty one per cent. of oxygen and in this film, with great attention to important details, this element is extracted from the air and with it many interesting experiments are conducted. For instance, oxygen, being a gas, aids in combustion and the greater the oxygen the greater the combustion, even iron burns like charcoal when it is held in a flame and oxygen applied. The experiments, all of them, will interest a great many persons who will be glad of the opportunity for a study of physics.

ALONG THE PADAS RIVER (Oct. 1).—The Padas river runs through a forest in the island of Borneo and this forest is noted for the rare woods that grow there. The natives make their chief occupation the gathering of these expensive timbers, but this is not the chief attraction of the Padas river, as the scenery is exceptionally fine.

THE DEPTHS OF HATE (Special—2 parts—Oct. 2).—Helen Embert, the daughter of the lodge keeper of the beautiful estate of Mrs. Melvina Jenkins, a wealthy widow, is in love with Bert Harrison, but in a short while Bert, through a thrilling accident, meets Mrs. Jenkins and her daughter, Mary. He falls in love with Mary, completely forgetting Helen, and the friendship he shows Mrs. Jenkins she mistakes for love. Helen, meeting Bert leaving the Jenkins' home after a dance, bitterly upbraids him for his treatment of her. Later Helen becomes ill over the affair and in a short while she dies. It is then that Mrs. Embert, Helen's mother, feels her heart consumed with hatred of those whom she considers responsible for her daughter's tragic death. She vows to be revenged, and, choosing Mary as the object of attack, has nearly succeeded, when Fate directs the law in her direction.

A CLEVER STORY (Oct. 3).—Gwendoline's father objected to Gwendoline's choice of an author for a lover, so Gwendoline and Horace elope. Some time later Horace wrote a detective story that so fascinated Gwendoline's father that he asked the author to find his daughter, from whom he had not heard in a year, offering a reward of $50,000 to Horace if he succeeded, and little knowing that the author was his son-in-law. Horace consulted Gwendoline and she announced that if her father missed her that badly, she would go to see him. Horace decided to accompany her, figuring that it would serve the old man right to be compelled to pay the reward because of his objections to him at the outset of the romance.

A WALL ST. WAIL (Oct. 4).—This is another of the clever cartoon stories which have scored such a signal success. It deals with the adventures of Willyum, a darky aviator, whose flight in an airship of his own make so closely resembles the journey of the inexperienced into Wall Street as to give the film its name. Willyum's balloon burst while he was in mid-air and down he came, but landed safely on a pole in the river,

"The Forgotten Melody"

2 Reels, October 8

Tony Vido unsuccessfully tries to have his opera produced. Disheartened, he goes west in a prairie schooner, which is attacked by Indians. Tony is wounded and is found unconscious by the soldiers, who drive the Indians away. Mrs. Vido is killed, and Annette, their daughter, with the music in her possession, is saved by a miner who adopts her, and grows to womanhood. Tony is half demented from grief, and wanders about as a street musician. Annette arranges to have the opera produced, but some bars are missing. Tony hears the strains of his music and takes up the tune on his violin, supplying the missing bars. Annette goes out to find the musician as Tony enters by another door. He supplies the missing notes, and when Annette returns there is a touching reunion between father and daughter.

"The Revelation"

1 Reel, October 10

Burns, a student of psychology, is vexed at the attentions of Bates to Mrs. Burns. He falls asleep and dreams he is existing in prehistoric days when cave men fought like animals. He and Bates are rivals for Mrs. Burns, a wild girl, and terrific combats take place between them in which Burns is finally vanquished. He awakens to hear his wife's screams as she tries to evade the embraces of Bates. He is stopped from shooting Bates by his wife, and as Bates walks away Burns notes that he has a slight limp—just like the Bates of his dream, who was injured fighting with him. This picture is staged according to the best data from noted authorities and, in addition to being weird and fascinating, is of exceptional educational value.

"Mother's Boy"

One reel, Sept. 25. The fat boy is his mother's pet. His father, the police inspector, longs to chastise his lazy son, but the mother protects her darling. Two girls are in love with Fatty, and the disappointed one orders one of her suitors to thrash Fatty. A furious fight results, when two bears butt in and chase the fighters up a telegraph post, and amusing situations arise before they are rescued.

"The Bowling Match"

One reel, Sept. 27. Two men bowl for the love of Mabel. Each has his crowd with him. One bribes the pin boy to place metal spots on the alley and the bottom of the pins, so that when the other makes a strike the pins immediately hop back in place again. The trick is discovered and a riot takes place between the rival factions, and it is necessary to turn a fire hose on the belligerants to pry them loose.

"Billy Dodges Bills"

One reel, Oct. 2. Billy is harassed by creditors and tries to sneak away down the fire escape. He is chased from place to place by determined collectors, and discovers the sheriff among his pursuers. The sheriff, however, has received word that Billy is heir to a fortune of $50,000, and is trying to notify Billy of his good fortune, but Billy is nearly dead when the sheriff finally runs him down and imparts the glad tidings.

where he promptly started fishing, just as many persons fall from their dreamy soarings to the hard reality. While Willyum is fishing he falls asleep, just as many others do, and it is while he slumbers peacefully that things happen to him, and the funniest things imaginable, too.

RIDING THE FLUME (Oct. 4).—An unusual sight is the manner in which a mountain stream has been brought down the mountain side in the state of Washington to a power house and over it a motor railway has been built and this is the original of the scenic railways which are a feature of all the big amusement parks.

PLANTS WHICH EAT (Oct. 7).—It will surprise a number of persons to know that there are plants which obtain nourishment by devouring insects. Those who are surprised will be naturally interested and those already interested will be glad of the opportunity to see the various experiments that prove that plants secret a digestive fluid which will assimilate any insect.

HOW MOUNTAINS GROW (Oct. 7).—This release inaugurates a new kind of film in which a heavy scientific subject is explained in a manner that proves the theory and at the same time is easily understood. An absorbingly entertaining educational picture.

A JOURNEY THROUGH CRIMEA (Oct. 7).—A very interesting tour through the country that was the seat of one of the world's most bitter wars.

THE SMUGGLER (Oct. 8).—A father, wishing to give his daughter the advantage of a good education, sends her to a private school and then disappears. The girl's tuition reaches the school regularly, but the money is earned by smuggling, the girl's father being the leader of a band of customs dodgers. After a few years the longing to see his daughter influences the father to desert the crooked path in order that he may live with his daughter. But the old companions are not to be so easily set aside and the father's determination to forget them precipitates a tragedy which is narrowly averted.

TWO MOTHERS (Special—2 parts—Oct. 9).—Little Betty Emerson one day finds herself an orphan. Her father has been killed in an accident and the shock unseats her mother's reason. The authorities send the child to an asylum. A year goes by and then a wealthy widow, Mrs. Blake, childless and longing for companionship, calls at the asylum. She is immediately attracted to Baby Betty and adopts her. About ten years later Mrs. Emerson is discharged from the insane asylum totally cured. She returns to her old home and is informed that her child has been placed in an asylum. At the asylum she learns, by strategy, the name of Betty's foster-mother. She calls upon Mrs. Blake and begs her to give her back the child. Mrs. Blake has learned to love Betty as a daughter and demurrs. Into this scene of the two mothers, Betty enters. Both women plead with her, one to return and the other to stay. The girl has the solution to the problem by staying with both of them. The film is full of sensational and unexpected developments, is well acted and tells a story that will reach every heart.

THE MILLIONAIRE'S WARD (Oct. 10).—Walter Saunders, a young millionaire, is robbed by a girl street singer and in court the girl pleads that her guardian compelled her to steel under threats of a beating. The millionaire's sympathies are aroused and he asks the court to place the girl in his custody. He discovers that the girl, Rose, has a beautiful voice and he sends her to Europe to study music. Saunders is engaged to a beautiful debutante, Alice Carson, when Rose returns from across the sea. Walter's friendship for his ward arouses the jealousy of Alice and she places her bracelet in Rose's bag and then announces that she has been robbed. It looks as though justice will be defeated, but a clever detective uncovers enough evidence to convince Walter and unite Rose and the millionaire in the ties that nothing can sever.

TALKATIVE TESS (Oct. 11).—When John Tompkins married Tessie Squiggs he thought he had a prize, but soon found that he was wedded to a human phonograph. Tess talked morning, noon and night, and even in her sleep she recounted the gossip of the neighborhood until one night a burglar paid a visit to the house. Tess awoke and she talked so much to the burglar that he had to gag her. John, coming home late, found his wife gagged and the burgdar ransacking the place. He laughed, much to the burglar's surprise, and then congratulated the highwayman on his accomplishment, leaving the house with him to buy a drink. Tess finally got loose and she had several things to say, but she picked out the wrong man to tell her tale of woe.

KALEM.

AND THE WATCH CAME BACK (Oct. 3).—Jack forgets his watch in leaving the house. He misses it later and suspects an old man who has bumped into him of having stolen it. He pursues the man and forcibly takes a watch from him. When Jack returns home he finds his own timepiece on the dresser.

Realizing he has stolen the old man's watch, Jack throws it out of the window to get rid of it. It falls into a policeman's hat and is returned. Pinned onto the coat of his chum, it returns. Despite his efforts to dispose of it, the watch invariably comes back.

Jack is in love with Anna. He has never met her father, who has just returned from a long journey. The old man informs the police he has been robbed of his timepiece by a bold highwayman. Jack's suspicious conduct leads to his arrest when he goes to call on Anna. He is taken to court and is confronted by his sweetheart and his future father-in law, who have come to identify the desperate character.

But the mistake is explained and Anna helps mollify her father, who gets his watch back. Jack heaves a sigh of relief when the watch disappears into his future father in-law's pocket, never to come back.

HISTORIC BOSTON (Oct. 3).—Every spot hallowed by history in and about Boston is shown in this picture. Among the scenes are Faneuil Hall, Lexington Battlefield, Bunker Hill Monument, the Old Belfry, the Wayside Inn, and many others of equal interest. This picture possesses all the advantages of a tour to Boston with none of the discomforts of travel.

THE RAILROAD INSPECTOR'S PERIL (Oct. 4).—Ballard, division superintendent of freight, is notified that unless his son Jack, a freight inspector, can stop the numerous thefts of freight, the boy will lose his position.

Jack receives this information just prior to the forwarding of a valuable freight shipment. He determines to accompany this shipment to the end of his division.

The young inspector is deeply in love with Jane. His father opposes the match, thinking the girl unworthy of his son. Jack is bidding Jane goodbye just before the freight trains pulls out when Ballard interferes. Rather than come between father and son, Jane, broken hearted, leaves. Her departure causes a quarrel between Jack and his father.

Jane overhears the box car thieves' plot to rob the freight. She tells Ballard what she has learned. The latter telegraphs ahead to intercept the train, but is too late. Jane, hearing this, picks up Ballard's revolver, jumps into his auto, which is standing outside, and goes in pursuit of the train.

Jack, seated on top of one of the freight cars, is made prisoner by Bad Bill, who then directs the looting of the car. Jane overtakes the freight train, leaps aboard the last car and climbs to the top. She sees her sweetheart's predicament.

The brave girl holds up Bad Bill with her pistol. A ruse by the bandit chief causes her to turn her head for a moment and the thief takes the opportunity to jump off the car into a lake which they are just passing. Nothing daunted, Jane leaps after the bandit.

Jack's father has notified the authorities and a locomotive carrying detectives is sent to the rescue. They overhaul the freight train and capture Bad Bill's confederates. A moment later, Jane, dripping wet, but with revolver still leveled, marches up with her prisoner.

Her courage arouses the admiration of Jack's father and he gives his consent to their marriage.

THE END OF THE RUN (Oct. 6).—Rufus Trent, engineer of the Fast Mail, is keenly attached to his old engine. When an order comes which results in his being assigned to a new locomotive, the old man is almost heart-broken.

Billy Warren, Trent's fireman, is in love with Ruth, the engineer's daughter. He notices that the new engine is wearing the old man down, and later discovers that Thent's sight is rapidly failing. As a result of this only Billy's vigilance averts a serious accident.

Billy urges Ruth to persuade her father to retire, but the old man angrily resents the suggestion that he is growing old. And more and more does the safety of the passengers depend upon Billy's alertness.

An opportunity for promotion comes, but because it would take him from Trent, the fireman deliberately turns it down. One day, while Billy's attention is claimed by low steam pressure, the old man runs past a danger signal and almost derails the train. His fireman averts a terrible accident in the nick of time. The ignoring of the signal is reported and Trent and Billy are suspended.

The facts become known, however, and Billy gets his promotion. He marries Ruth.

Two years later he tells Trent, who has aged rapidly, of his new engine. The old man leaves the house to go to the roundhouse for the purpose of inspecting Billy's locomotive. He wanders into the junk yard and comes across his old locomotive—scrapped. Deeply affected, Trent climbs aboard his beloved engine and slides into the old familiar seat.

There Billy and Ruth find him several hours later, head bowed on chest, hand on throttle—at the End of the Run.

THE RIDDLE OF THE TIN SOLDIER (Special—2 parts—Oct. 8).—Ethel Andrews is interested in settlement work. Her father refuses to co-operate with her. Ethel kidnaps her five-year-old brother Archie and places him in a tenement as an object lesson. To make the kidnapping appear the work of criminals, Ethel sends her a father a note demanding $10,000. Gangsters learn of the plan.

Andrews engages Madelyn Mack, a girl detective, to find his son. Madelyn unearths several clues, among which are fragments of a tin soldier belonging to Archie. She strongly suspects Ethel of being implicated in the matter.

Ethel, regretting her rash act, goes back to the tenement to bring Archie home. The gangsters capture them both, and send a note to Andrews telling him his son and daughter are prisoners. One of the gangsters shoots the note into the Andrews' library with a sling shot, just as Madelyn is telling the father of her suspicions concerning Ethel The note upsets her theories.

Madelyn discovers that the paper on which the gangsters' note is written has contained powdered Jasco berry, an Oriental drug used in cigarette form. Later, she succeeds in tracing Ethel and Archie to the tenement, but finds them gone.

Passing a crowd collected on a corner, Madelyn scents the odor of jasco berry and finds the man who is smoking it. She follows him and discovers the cottage in the suburbs where Ethel and Archie have been taken. She slips into the house and enters the room where the two are confined.

Discovering a telephone wire outside the window, Madelyn taps the line with a pocket phone and summons assistance. She is discovered by the gangsters, who are just about to break into the room when the police arrive. A desperate battle ensues, which ends in the capture of the kidnappers.

Andrews presents Madelyn with a check for $10,000 for her splendid work. The detective gives the check to Ethel for settlement use, but Andrews, returning the check, smilingly donates the money himself.

PETE'S INSURANCE POLICY (Oct. 10).—Pete Jefferson, a colored gentleman, wants to cash in on a life insurance policy he has just taken out—so he decides to play "dead" and collect immediately.

His mother consents to aid him in the scheme. Pete's friends are soon notified of his death. They come to view the "corpse."

Mandy, Pete's sweetheart, shows intense grief, to the "dead" man's delight. But when a rival comforts her affectionately, the "Corpse" shows signs of uneasiness.

Friends sitting up with the "remains," pass away the time with a watermelon and a crap game. Pete becomes interested in the latter and eats the former. When the watchers find the watermelon gone they fear ghosts and flee in terror.

His death having been made public, Pete leaves to collect his insurance—but finds the company bankrupt. Hurrying home, the "dead" man walks in upon the mourners. Consternation reigns until the hearty kisses bestowed upon Mandy assures them the "corpse" is very much alive.

THE SEA SCOUTS OF AMERICA (Oct. 10).—This picture shows the daily routine on board the good ship "Pioneer," the only vessel in existence manned by the "Sea Scouts of America."

The Sea Scouts, the only body of its kind, are located in Boston and occupy a position afloat similar to that of the Boy Scouts on land. The boys, some of whom appear no older than eight or nine years, are shown going over the masthead, hoisting sail, manning the life boat, and in general, performing the duties of regular "grown-up" sailors. A picture the youngsters will delight in.

THE INFLUENCE OF A CHILD (Oct. 11).—His wife desperately ill, and without money for medicine or food, Bat Carney consents to help Jim Cooper rob a safe in a near-by saloon. Kissing his wife and Anna, his six-year-old daughter, Bat leaves with Cooper for the scene of the robbery.

While at work on the safe, the two are discovered by a policeman. Shots are exchanged and Bat is killed.

Cooper, who lives in the flat above Carney, slinks home. As he passes the Carney flat, Anna comes to the door and begs him to come in and see what ails her mother. The crook enters and finds Mrs. Carney dead.

Calling the neighbors, Cooper tells them of the woman's death. Feeling that he is responsible for the death of her father, he decides to take care of Anna, who has taken a fancy to him, until other arrangements can be made.

Cooper gives up his bed to the child and hears her pray that her mama be awakened and that her papa come home. Touched by the simple plea, he writes for the authorities to come for the child.

The next morning, Anna helps him with his breakfast, and then packing a dinner pail, tells him it is time for him to go to work. Amazed, Cooper takes it. As he turns to go, the child makes him return and give her a goodbye kiss. Impelled by the thought of the chcild, the crook secures an honest job.

He returns that evening just as the authorities are taking Anna away. The child frantically tries to free herself. Moved by her pleadings, the crook takes her in his arms and announces that he will adopt the little girl.

That night an old pal comes and informs Cooper of a jewelwry store that would be easy picking for burglars. Cooper reaches for his hat, but Anna clinging to him, pleads with him to remain at home. "Please don't go like papa," she cries. "He never came back."

Throwing down his hat, Cooper catches Anna in his arms. Turning to his pal he tells him that he is through with a burglar's life. Henceforth, he vows, he will be a father to Anna, and take care of her as a true father should.

SELIG.

THE YOUNG MRS. EAMES (Special—2 parts—Sept. 22).—Dorris Eames, an attractive young widow, is much sought by the opposite sex, but she treats them all alike. In spite of this fact, Bob Cary, a middle-aged bachelor, is very much in love with her. She gives a reception and Gerald Leighton shows his admiration for Dorris. At first she is amused at his attentions, and then consents to his calling upon her. He gives her his photograph and claims her. They become engaged and he gives her a ring—for the nonce she is a prisoner in spite of her better judgment. She goes to the convent and brings home her daughter, Lucile, to bear her company during vacation. Gerald comes to call, and is much impressed with the young lady, so much so, that he forgets his standing with her mother, and makes love in a hot headed way that she overhears.

The words beat upon the portals of her ears, she drags herself into her own boudoir and studies her face in the glass. Then for the first time she realizes that time has told and that youth will inevitably claim its own. She wisely determines upon heroic, but not vengeful action, slips the young man his ring and intimates that their little joke has ended without letting him know the truth of the matter as she has seen and heard. Fortunately for her, life holds better opportunities, and the faithful bachelor appears on the scene at the psychological moment and claims her.

SISSYBELLE (Sept. 22).—Percy Putnam is the pampered seven-year-old darling of a wealthy mother. In order that he be kept safe she has him cabined in the nursery, playing with dolls, just like his little sister, so that he will not become contaminated by the naughty boys in the neighboring streets. Every time Percy has an ache or a pain, strikes a live pin or a lingering splinter, she puts him to bed and sends for the family physician. This system begins to pall upon Percy's pa, and he connives with the doctor to get his boy away from the sickly and effeminating influences that come with starting a boy sewing, playing with dolls—instead of going out in the back alley and having something "handed to him" from the dirty mit of a hoodlum—enforced lessons in hardihood that every boy should have to meet for which he learns the manly art of self-defense.

THE INVISIBLE GOVERNMENT (Special—2 parts—Sept. 29).—The scene opens in the Croesus Club. John Drexel is discovered reading a paper, which intimates the existence of "The Invisible Government" and its pernicious activities, and stamps his foot hard, declaring: "It must be discovered and suppressed." He immediately consults with the great detective, John Street. The next scene goes to Pendelton's headquarters, Pendelton being the unscrupolous political "boss," and they are about to levy "the usual defense fund." Another scene flashes and shows Pendelton sending out his henchman to kill the "corruption inquiry bill" that dies abornin'—mystaeriously. This merely tempers the mettle of "The Man in the Street" to meet and overcome the unseen adversaries of law and order of the essential principles upon which the Republic is based—in the rule for and by the people.

Percy Pendelton is a visitor in good standing at the Drexel mansion and is impulsively urging the romantic niece, Margaret, of that wealthy house to marry him. In order to make this more alluring, he urges a "secret marriage," dominating the time for the next day at noon. The Pendelton house is next to the Drexel residence, and these two factors of romance and mystery go back and forth through a scuttle in the roof. News of the elopment having come to Drexel, he makes a new clause in his will, giving his niece $100,000.00 providing she does not marry Percy Pendelton. She overhears this and confesses her intention, when Street intervenes, observing there is a hidden motive in the marriage that they must investigate. At his suggestion, she shows the Pendeltons the will, pretending that she has stolen it. Pendelton declares that they must have the $100,000.00 anyway and plans that they will get the daughter into their house and secret her for a ransom. This Margaret at first refuses to do, and then pretends to fall in with the plot, on the advice of Street, who wishes to catch Pendleton with "the goods on him."

Margaret takes Mary by way of the connected roofs and she is locked in the secret room. Pendelton then scribbles on the deuce of hearts to Drexel: "If you want your daughter call off detective and bring $100,000.00. We'll do the rest." She takes this card to her uncle. The first reel ends as Mary is observed eating a dainty luncheon, a prisoner in the Pendelton home.

Acting under Street's advice, Drexel has gone to the bank, drawn out $100,000.00 in cash, and that evening Margaret leads the creatures of Pendelton into the Drexel home by way of the roof, and Pendelton gives each member of this "cabinet" a certain amount of marked money. They all go back and Drexel follows them. Pendelton thereupon defies him, and tells him that his niece is one of them. At this point the police appear, summoned by a pre-arranged signal, and Pendelton and his son dart into a secret room, the door of which is concealed by hanging rugs. In fact, the walls of the room are completely covered by rugs. They then slide down a pole to the basement. The son goes first and a boat falls on him, pinning him to the floor. Anxious as the father is to get away, he lingers, trying to aid his beloved son, who suffers agony from a broken leg. In the interim, Margaret has discovered the sunken handle that opens the secret door, and they all rush into the room. They find a second secret door behind the rugs and Street plunges through into the shaft, followed by Margaret and the officers. Pendelton surrenders himself and gives up the money. The final scene shows Street comfortably environed at the Croesus Club, reviewing the scenes that, through a series of dissolving views, show the downfall of "The Invisible Government."

"THE FALSE FRIEND" (Sept. 30).—Guy Morris, a promising young medical matriculate, is in love with Stella Razeto, but he has a false friend in Henry Walker, who forges a letter from him to the girl, which causes her to dismiss him without explanation. Then the rival having cleared his way treacherously steps in and wins the girl.

Ten years fly swiftly by; the medical student has achieved distinction in his chosen profession and gone steadily up, while Henry Walker has gone down. The woman that he married under false pretenses has suffered and shared his ignoble lot uncomplainingly and is left a widow in reduced circumstances. She is compelled to take in sewing. She sends her child out on an errand and the little one is struck by an automobile and appears to be seriously injured. She is carried to a hospital, where Dr. Walker, her mother's former sweetheart, is the interne. The mother visits the place to see the child; the elderly pair meet face to face for the first time since the fatal letter parted them.

Through his marvelous skill the doctor restores the child, and from the mother he learns the truth about the forged letter that parted them in the long ago. A new light flashes across the meridian of their lives, the old love lives again and romance becomes a reality.

THE CATTLE THIEF'S ESCAPE (Oct. 1).—John Morrison, educated for the ministry, is all the true stature of a real man. He goes West to preach the gospel in the cattle country. He likes the men, the cowboys and the country, and at the same time he has a hankering for the fair sex; in fact, he falls in love with Rose Craig, the daughter of a ranchman. This last move is not so highly relished by the male members of his congregation, as girls in that section are really rarer, and he, picking the choice, consequently wins the enmity of many men, who felt they had the right of prior claim. A bunch of disappointed suitors plan to thrash the successful preacher, but much to their astonishment, he trounces the entire crowd. The cowards sneak off ingloriously, but one plans to "fix" the stigma of "cattle-rustler" upon him. However, the real cattle thief is discovered just in time and "with the goods." Again the parson takes the initiative and persuades the revengeful parties that having recovered their property, they can afford to allow the thief a minute's leeway to get out of sight. The rustler takes advantage of the situation to drop over a cliff, and the parson is reinstated as the master of the situation.

OUR NEIGHBORS (Oct. 2).—Salesman Smith lives next door to Banker Marvin. Mrs. Smith, while she would be politely known as a cynic, is in reality "a grouch." She repulses all the advances made by her wealthy, but democratic neighbors, holding that they are simply prompted by commiseration for her humble situation. The children of the families yearn for each other's company, but Mrs. Smith sternly checks any advances upon her side. Finding her daughter, Marjorie, in conversation with the banker's son, Howard, on the other side of the back fence, she upbraids her spiritedly. The banker's wife broadmindedly excuses Mrs. Smith's action, thinking that she is worried over something, but otherwise is all right. She gives the little Marvin girl a beautiful bouquet, whereat the scolded Mrs. Smith orders her daughter to throw it back in the yard. The elder daughter, however, prevents this impolite act. Some days later she finds the little boy next door is very ill. She secretly visits him, and is punished when her mother finds it out.

Smith has purchased his home on "the installment plan," and falls into arrears, and a sight draft for $500.00 against him, which happens to come through Marvin's bank, is ordered to be paid or the premises vacated. This is the crowning blow for Mrs. Smith, who is terribly incensed against innocent Banker Marvin. She talks out loud so much and so often that her children become familiar with her side of the case and take up the quarrel. Little Flo writes poor little Ted, the sick boy, a note to the effect: "Your hard, cruel old papa is going to take our home away, but I still hope you will get well." The banker's wife and himself determine to overcome this unreasonable prejudice, and help the Smith family, despite the antagonistic attitude of Mamma Smith. Banker Marvin relieves the financial stringency, the young folks make love over the back fence, and Mrs. Smith acknowledges in all humility to her husband: "I once believed rich people had no hearts, but they are really at times very human."

JOHN BOUSALL OF THE U. S. SECRET SERVICE" (Oct. 3).—John Bousall, a United States Secret Service operative, is stationed in a great Dutch diamond port, chiefly to keep track of purchases made by persons bound for the United States. A band of New York smugglers has been working through this port very skilfully and very successfully, and they are the first object of his solicitude. Bousall learns that an Americanized Italian, Alberti, who poses as a count, has recently made large purchases and contemplates sailing on the S. S. Vollendam.

At a prior time, young Bousall happens to be presented to Alice Gordon, a wealthy young American, who is touring with her father and brother through Holland. When he learns that the "Count" is about to sail, he takes passage on the same steamer, and a cablegram summons Miss Gordon's father, her brother and herself to come immediately to New York, so that they happen to be fellow passengers at the last moment. Jans, a waiter in the hotel, in reality a famous crook, has discovered Alberti, a guest at his house, concealing diamonds in a corselet, which he puts around his body, and secures passage on the Vollendam, with a view, incidentally, to taking the diamonds, and, if necessity dictates, the Italian's life. Owing to the rush for accommodations Ben Gordon is placed in Alberti's cabin. Things soon begin to happen. One morning Ben Gordon wakes up to find that Alberti, who occupied the berth below him, has been murdered, and he is immediately taken in charge as a suspect on the testimony of the cabin steward, so the captain orders him in irons. Prior to this, Ben has observed his sister talking with Bousall, and with the impetuosity of youth, and without stopping to inquire into their previous acquaintance, orders him away. Ben's arrest causes his sister and father the keenest anguish, and Bousall, forgetting the indignity put upon himself, generously determines to help them. The captain of the ship is about to send a wireless, informing New York of the murder's approach and asking as to his disposition, when father Gordon importunes him not to make known the name of his son, who has been arrested merely on circumstantial evidence, as the blow would kill his mother, now seriously ill in New York. The captain blusters; he will not be bullied on his own ship, when Bousall quietly draws him aside, shows him the badge of the Secret Service and takes possession of the wireless office himself.

In the interim he has discovered the disguise of Jans and has fairly well satisfied himself that he is the real murderer. The consequence is that when the steamer arrives, Jans, who is trying to make a getaway, is arrested; the diamonds are discovered on his person; Ben Gordon is released; the smugglers are brought to justice, and Bousall wins a sentimental reward that is to him finer by far than diamonds.

THE DREAM OF DAN McQUIRE (Oct. 8).—Dan McGuire, a hod carrier, in addition to bearing burdens by day, has ambitions in his dreams when he naps at noon time. In the realm of dreams, Jasen Cox, a coon mortar mixer, and Morris Levey, timekeeper, become fabulous personalities. McGuire snores a top note, indicating that his uncle in Ireland has left him a million, and Morris Levey becomes his banker, the custodian of this nest-egg. He moves his wife and their frowsy kidlets from his shanty in Goat Town and installs them in a palatial home with an entourage that includes a lackey who is always "doing things" to a fair McGuire, in the form of brushing his clothes, snatching tools from his hand at the table, preventing him from becoming a sword swallower, or otherwise making a mark of himself by droll dressing. McGuire becomes the political "boss" in the fourth ward and Mrs. McGuire makes a bold break in society. McGuire, used to plain "suds," becomes very much mixed with fancy drinks. Mrs. McGuire, in order to break her husband of the fancy drink habit, assumes inebriety herself, and things come to a terrific head-on-climax in a big fourth ward social function when someone drops a brick on McGuire's head, which brings him to a realizing sense that he has not a million, but it is time for him to fill his hod and climb skyward.

THE MISSIONARY AND THE ACTRESS (Oct. 7).—John Vance, a missionary, is ordered by his physician to a quiet summer resort for rest and recuperation. There also comes Aileen Calvert, an idol of a burlesque theater, the toast of the so-called "bald-head row," likewise for the benefit of peace and change. Her antecedents are quite unknown, and she becomes interested in Vance, as a type of man quite new to her.

She adopts the role of the artless maiden and leads the guileless man a chase for her own amusement. He becomes infatuated and she listens with quiet amusement to his talk of an ideal life in the service of the Master. On the day before departing on his long trip to the foreign fields, he tells her his love and places upon her finger a ring, given with the word "Mizpah." She is unwilling to disillusion him and allows him to depart in the belief that she is herself an innocent and simple soul, but she returns to the old life in the glare of the footlights and the fetid atmosphere of the burlesque stage.

The year passes quickly and Vance returns from abroad sooner than he expected. By chance he sees her picture on a theater poster, learns her vocation, and eventually they come face to face. The shock and the disappointment is too much for the man. Real love flashes over her wasted, vacuous life, but it is too late. He leaves her and sails away to the South Sea to give the remainder of his life up to the care of the leper colony. The woman is stricken with remorse, gives up her gay and feverish career and devotes her time to the lowly in the city tenements. Eventually she contracts a malignant fever, and as the shadows darken about her she sends him the ring he gave her with a message of real love, as a memory of brighter days to sustain him in his work in the far away islands of the sea.

SAVED FROM THE VIGILANTES (Oct. 9).—Two husky Westerners, Bud Lee and Curt Buldsoe, have formed an attachment for the trig daughter of the stage agent, Pearl Tollifer. The men conclude to settle the difficulty of debate by fists and have a fight behind the station, in which Bludsoe has his nome illustrated at the hands of more skilful foe. Disgruntled over the "claret" effusion on his hickory shirt, Bludsoe bribes a tramp to steal a horse and drive it into Lee's corral. In the interim, the defeated lover has been very busy giving information to the head of a Vigilante committee whose specialty is horse thieves. The victorious, but unfortunate Lee, is taken prisoner and is about to be launched in a lynching bee, when his younger brother, Jeff Lee, who is an amateur telegrapher, shins up a pole, attaches an instrument and sends a message to Pearl. She is a "live wire" and immediately gets in touch with the sheriff, who wrings a confession from the tramp, who was thrown from the top of a moving freight train after stealing the horse, which exonerates Curt. The sheriff, the girl and the tramp join the Vigilantes just in time to save the good man from an air dance.

ONLY FIVE YEARS OLD (Oct. 10).—This film shows the adventures of the tiniest tot in the Elmville orphanage, who one day wanders out through the open door into the big world and strays down the shady street until she becomes aware that it is high noon—that she is weary and hungry. Her little feet bring her to the door of a quaint old house, the residence of three old maids, Prue, Amanda and Priscilla. Of the three, the latter has in her heart the mother love and shows kindness to the kiddie, but precise Prue, angrily orders her away, while the austere Amanda, seconds the motion concerning the child nuisance. Priscilla, however, prevails, gives the little one a bowl of bread and milk and after the simple repast, Agnes climbs into Prue's lap and goes to sleep. This warms the frosty maiden lady so mightily, that the maternal instinct rises and she refuses to allow the child to be taken away. Presently the matron of the orphanage appears, and takes little Agnes back with her. But Prue grieves almost insanely over her departure and nurses her rag doll. Finally the three sisters go to the orphanage and adopt little Agnes, who brings new life and light into their barren lives.

MELIES.

THINGS JAPANESE (Oct. 2).—Section one of this picture deals with children of Japan—and there are none more interesting. Leaving school each day they are obliged to salute their teacher goodbye. After school the games of "Menko" and "Jump Jimmy" are enthusiastically indulged in. And not the least interesting of Japanese children is the street actress. She performs in a manner that appears strange to us, but that draws a great crowd in the streets of a Japanese city. Her antics are wonderful, considering her extreme youth.

Japanese at work is the second section. In the kitchen; at the saw mill; the street cobbler; the mussel fishers of Yokohama, and the Japanese hair dresser—all of which pictures show why the Japanese people, though lacking in stature, are superior in skill and agility to almost any other race.

HIS NEIGHBOR'S WIFE (Feature Subject).—Mr. Norton discovers his wife in the arms of his neighbor, Captain Roberts, a married man. His first maddened impulse is to kill his faithless wife, but on his way for the gun his little child runs to his arms to say good-night. The incident unnerves him, and his wild determination is destroyed. He decides upon another course. He goes to Mrs. Roberts and tells her that he intends to ruin the Captain's home as her husband had ruined his, and that unless she consents to elope with him at ten o'clock that night he will shoot her husband on sight. Mrs. Roberts, in grief and despair, promises to elope in order to save her husband's life. That evening, when the Captain returns, she accuses him of his sin, and he makes an earnest and effective plea for forgiveness. Meantime the grim hour for her decision is past, and with the strength of woman's devotion, she determines to sacrifice her life for her husband, rather than stain his name. Donning his military cap and cape she walks out on the veranda, just as Mr. Norton has accepted her absence to signify her refusal to elope. True to his threat, when he sees the figure on the veranda, he mistakes it for the Captain and shoots.

The Captain realizes the bitter fruits of his sin, but the wound is not fatal, and the courageous wife's nobility and bravery inspire an admiration in her husband's heart that completely resurrects the old love. Mercy is mightiest in the mightiest.

IN THE BISHOP'S CARRIAGE (Feature Subject—5 parts).—It was not altogether Nance Olden's fault that she was an inmate of the Charity House; neither was she to blame for being forced to escape. Falsely accused of theft, and cruelly punished, she decides to rid herself forever of the matron's persecution. Pursued by the police, she takes refuge in the room of Tom Dorgan, the crook, where later he finds her. Both refugees from a doubtful justice, their common lot inspires them to establish a partnership in crime. After a daring theft of jewels, the loss of which is almost immediately discovered, Nance, in terrified despair, eludes the police by jumping into "the bishop's carriage." From this incident a chain of thrilling adventures progress, until Nance is again rescued from the police by the timely intervention of Obermuller, a theatrical manager, who is impressed with her mimic talent and who offers her a position on the stage and a chance to travel the straight road. Now occurs a bitter contest between Dorgan and Obermuller for the loyalty of Nance, which is culminated by the arrest and conviction of Tom. Nance's admiration for Obermuller ripens into requited love, and she attains fame and fortune as an actress. And then a shadow of the past crosses her path; Tom escapes and returns to claim her; but his purpose is defeated by Obermuller.

Only once more is she tempted by the old fascination, only once more she steals—steals an illegal contract from the theatrical syndicate that is attempting to crush Obermuller, and then she really conquers the preying weakness, marries Obermuller and drinks the sweets of a righteous existence.

CHIVALRY DAYS (Oct. 8).—Laura Fontaine, a poor but beautiful Southern girl, who lives with her invalid mother and her darky slave, Mandy, is loved by Horace Lee, a wealthy planter, and also by Elmer Grandin, another wealthy, but dissipated young man. Laura returns the love of Horace, thus incurring the jealousy and enmity of Elmer.

Horace and Laura become engaged before he departs for New York to take his degree in law. As months pass the large expense occasioned by the illness of Laura's mother causes Laura financial embarrassment. She confides her trouble to her friend, Mary Grandin, Elmer's sister. Mary, thinking only of her brother's desire to make Laura his wife, tells Laura she will loan her money, and Laura, ignorant of business methods, and trusting her friend, Mary, signs, without reading the papers, an agreement to repay the money within three months or give over her home and all her personal property, including her maid, Mandy, to Elmer Grandin.

The day for the money to be paid arrives and Elmer once more urges Laura to marry him. Laura, loving only Horace, refuses, and Elmer, infuriated, tells her that she must marry him or lose everything she owns. Mandy, coming in the doorway, overhears Elmer's threat and rushes to the home of Mable, Horace's sister, where she tells her mistress' troubles to Jim, her sweetheart, who is Horace's servant. Jim at once takes Mandy to his mistress. Mable is horrified to learn of Elmer and Mary's treachery. She telegraphs at once to her brother, Horace. In the meantime, Elmer has given Laura three days in which to choose absolute poverty or marriage with him. Mable arriving, learns the trouble from Laura, and knowing one of Laura's sensitive nature would not accept assistance from her fiancé's sister, Mable resolves to say nothing of her intentions, but to comfort Laura as best she can, and when the time arrives to repay the money herself. Upon the third day she makes it a point to be at Laura's home when the meeting takes place between Laura and Elmer. Hiding behind the portieres, she hears Elmer's vicious threats. Mable steps forth and confronts Elmer and pays him the money. Elmer, chagrined, takes his departure and is only gone from the room a moment when Horace enters. Upon hearing Laura's troubles, Horace seeks satisfaction from Elmer and a duel is arranged.

Jim hearing of his master's intention to fight Elmer, runs and informs Mable. Mable and Laura rush frantically to the field, and arrive in time to prevent the duel. Mary, regretting her duplicity, also comes upon the scene. Explanations and apologies bring about a reconciliation.

THE PILGRIM—MESSENGER OF LOVE (Oct. 10).—A hairy man, his woman and his daughter, sit in their hut with dirt and squalor surrounding them. The man brings on some meat, which they tear at and devour. The man, with greedy instincts, goes and hides the remainder of the meat beneath some stones. The daughter follows him and sees the hiding place.

A stranger comes to the hut, clad in skins. He has just rescued a little lamb from beneath a fallen log, under which it had been caught. He takes the lamb to the water and bathes its wounded leg and notes with joy its capering as it runs off.

The stranger comes to the hut and asks for a morsel of food and is refused; but the girl has seen the man's face, has noted its purity and sweetness, and has been strangely impressed. The stranger goes a short distance and falls with exhaustion. She sees this and runs to the hiding place, and getting the meat, gives it to the fainting stranger. It revives him, but the father meets the girl and beats her with his club. He is stopped by the pilgrim, who impresses him and who points out to him the wrong he is doing. For the first time the man of strength is dominated—his will bent—and he puts the stranger's hand on his shoulder and leads him to his home. There they find the woman beating the wretched girl. Again the wonderful voice and the eyes of the pilgrim work their wonderful fascination and the pilgrim watches the family enter their hut together.

REX.

SHADOWS OF LIFE (2 parts—Oct. 9).—The woman who was married for her money is sadly contemplating the life of her own choosing. Below a dinner party is in progress, presided over by the husband who married alone for wealth. He is surrounded by his friends. He notices that his wife is not present and, against her wishes, she is led into the company. At the height of the revelry, a wandering musician passes the house playing upon his violin. He is called in and marks the fine woman out of her sphere. From the depths of his soul he plays to the disappointed wife. He plays music which but she and himself can understand.

The husband chafes under the yoke of his wife's dignity, and the restraint placed upon himself. He takes unto himself a paramour, a woman of his own type. The estrangement between husband and wife grows until the husband sees an opportunity to forever rid himself of her. He purchases an unmanageable horse, a man-killer, and telling his wife that it is quite gentle, he presents it to her. That his evil plans may not miscarry, he places a thorn under the saddle a moment before the wife mounts for her first ride. The horse runs wild in a lonesome spot in the woods, the wife is thrown to the ground and rendered unconscious. She is found by the wandering musician. He takes her in his arms and carries her home. She is not dead, but crippled so that she will never walk again. His plans thus defeated, the husband goes from bad to worse with his paramour.

The crippled woman has now become the saint, the divinity of the wandering musician. Every evening he comes outside her window and plays the music which but they can understand. Finally he is even allowed to touch her hand with his lips.

When the riderless horse returned to the stable, the groom found the thorn under the saddle, and this, together with a note stolen from the wife's apartment by the maid, the groom is enlightened as to the manner of the accident. The groom then turns vampire and uses this information to bleed the guilty husband. He ceases to be the groom. He becomes the evil genius of the husband. He follows the husband and the paramour from place to place, and finally succeeds in replacing the husband in the paramour's affections.

One evening the musician comes to the accustomed spot outside the wife's window and plays his song of worship. He then takes a rose, his daily tribute, and places it in the hand resting upon the sill. The hand is cold, and the rose falls to the ground. The wife is dead. The minstrel enters a monastery where on his former pilgrimages he had taught the gentle monks to play the violin, and the doors of the solemn structure receive him.

Again, years afterward, the groom and the husband meet. The groom has become the keeper of a low dive. The husband, now with crime and brutal excess written upon his face, staggers into this dive and dies, an instant before he is recognized by the groom. And then each year the musician, monk now, climbs to a lofty mountain peak and there surrounded by the clouds, plays to his lost divinity.

THE ECHO OF A SONG (Oct. 12).—MacQuarrie is a modern Fagin—a man of almost irredeemable character. The mother is dead and he raises the children himself in his own way. He terrorizes them and makes them beg, while he carries on his business of petty thievery. When the children come in, he takes their money and pushes them out again. The weary children hear the sound of an organ as they pass a church, and being tired they enter. The organist sees their grief and gets their sad story from them. She insists upon accompanying them to their home, and is insulted by the father. She tells the police what she knows.

That night the father makes the children go out to beg again, and he starts forth with his tools to ply his nefarious trade. The children seek the church and the kind lady. She gathers them to her and all sing as she plays. The father is interrupted by the police, and in a running fight he is shot. He throws his hat away and misleads his followers. Passing the church, and being desperately wounded, he seeks its shelter. He sinks to the floor and sees his children with the organist. She plays a song that his mother used to sing, and in half delirium, his mind wanders back to earlier days. He sees his young mother at a similar organ and remembers the thrill it used to cause him. He sees himself coming home drunk and her anguish.

His time has come, and he staggers to the little group and gasps out a plea for forgiveness and dies. The organist clasps the children to her, determined that their lives shall start anew amidst beautiful surroundings.

VICTOR.

THE WINNER (2 parts—Oct. 10).—Jimmy Snell, a popular jockey, entertains Elinor Ranny, the fourteen-year-old daughter of his employer, and is greatly impressed by the young girl's sweet nature. Elinor, upon her departure from the stables, presents Snell with a rose, which the jockey preserves.

Within a period of five years from that time, Snell goes to the bad. Elinor Ranny, now grown to young womanhood, goes on a shopping tour accompanied by her school chum, Nora Kelton, whom she is visiting. Snell, while on a panhandling expedition, is hurled bodily from a saloon. The two girls witness the incident, and hasten to the side of the fallen man. Elinor recognizes Snell and declares her own identity. The two girls then scheme to procure Snell employment with the racing establishment of Nora's father, Frank Kelton. Snell, however, succeeds in placing himself with the Kelton stables. Jerry Pierson, a crooked bookmaker, schemes to prevent Kelton's entry from winning a big handicap. Snell defeats the scheme, is reinstated to good standing with the Jockey Club and rides Kelton's horse to victory.

DRESS REFORM (Oct. 7).—Pearl and Chester have been married quite a while and have been happy. One day Pearl receives a letter from her mother that she will stop with them for a few days, as she will visit the city on her lecturing tour on Reform Dress for women. Chester is disconsolate. Mother arrives. She induces Pearl to adopt her style of costume which consists of a short coat, short trousers, with the legs exposed. Chester pleads with his wife not to wear them, but she refuses. Chester, to get revenge, dresses as a woman. Pearl and her mother go out in the street. They are immediately made the center of a hooting, noisy mob. Mother disdains to notice them, but Pearl unable to stand the humiliation and the taunts runs. Chester meanwhile has taken a stroll and a young flirt attempts to attract his attention. Chester chastises him, just as Pearl comes running up, to where he is, followed by the mob. He takes her home. Mother arrives home and berates Chester for making fun of them. He orders her out of the house. Pearl begs Chester to take off his woman's apparel and she doffs her outlandish costume. She is sorry for the mistake she made in following mother's advice and promises Chester to stick to a more sane manner of dress in the future, leaving Dress Reform to mother and the rest of her club.

BALDY BELMONT WANTED A WIFE (Oct. 7).—Baldy Belmont and his friend kept batchelor apartments. Baldy is tired of eating and cooking and when he sees Martha Blodgett's ad in the newspaper for a husband he responds. She calls on the bachelors. When Baldy sees the wizened old maid he beats a hasty retreat. His friend is cooking his meal and Martha enters. She finishes the meal for him. In taking her kerchief from her pocketbook, his friend notices her bank book, which she accidentally drops. He makes love to her and after tasting her cooking he proposes marriage. Baldy returns and when he sees the fine meal his friend is enjoying and learns that Martha cooked it, he begins to regret his hasty action in so quickly judging the merits of Martha as a wife from her looks. He also discovers her bank book and the amount written therein as being to her credit and hastens to try to make amends. He finds that Martha and his friend have gone, but awaits their return. When they do return and Baldy is introduced to Martha as his friend's wife, he is in a state of collapse. He goes out into the garden and induces a boy to shoot the water hose at him to cool his rising anger and ardent love.

THE WOMAN AND THE LAW (Oct. 12).—Detective Murray is in love with Alice Barton. She is fascinated by his kindly manner and good looks. She sees him attentive to another girl, and her jealousy being aroused, she refuses to see him when he calls. She is proposed to by Fred Wilson, and, despite her mother's warnings, accepts him. They are married and she forgets all about Murray. Not so with Murray, however. A year passes and Fred becomes ill. He loses his position. A doctor is called by Alice to attend him, and she is informed that he has contracted tuberculosis and that he will have to be taken to a different climate. Alice is desperate, and being entirely without funds, knows not what to do. She determines to visit her mother and ask her assistance. Her mother is just in the act of paying out her last money in ready cash to the landlord for his rent. Alice sees this and while neither her mother nor the landlord is looking, she takes the money and goes out. He sees her and runs after her. She eludes him, but not before he had a good look at her and established her identity firmly in his mind. The next day he again sees her, and follows her. He finds out where she lives and demands his money. She denies having taken it, and her husband though ill and worn, becoming enraged at the accusation of theft made against his wife, throws the landlord out of the house. He goes and swears out a warrant for her arrest. He takes it to the police station to get an officer to serve it. Detective Murray is assigned to the job. He goes with the man to Alice's house. Upon his entry he is astounded to discovery that his supposed prisoner was to be the only woman he had ever loved. After listening to her story and discovering that she stole the money in order to try to save her sick husband's life, he, in his goodness of heart, makes good the landlord's loss and induces him to withdraw the charge.

THE STOLEN LOVE (2 parts—Oct. 6).—Pete, a fisher lad, is in love with Jennie, the daughter of the local fish factor. She returns his love and they are affianced. A cousin of Pete's, Albert, from a neighboring town, pays him a visit and falls in love with Jennie. Such is her infatuation for him that he persuades her to elope, giving as an excuse, that she has received an invitation from an aunt. A neighbor fisherman sees Jennie with a stranger and on his return to the fishing village spreads the gossip that she is in town with a man and not, as is generally supposed, with her aunt. Pete overhears this fisherman's gossip and knocks him down. The man naturally harbors resentment for this treatment and cherishes a plan for revenge. Pete goes to the city to ask the assistance of his cousin, Albert, in finding Jennie. He finds to his great sorrow that Jennie is living with Albert, but on being shown the wedding ring, forgives her.

A year passes and Albert turns out to be a useless drunkard and deserts his wife and baby. She in her poverty returns to her father's home where she is received with open arms. In the meantime Albert meets in a low saloon the man Pete knocked down for trifling with Jennie's name. This rascal persuades Albert to join him in robbing Pete's nets at night. Albert, who has changed much from the dapper young person he was when he first won Jennie's heart, that he has not much fear of detection. He joins them and they are seen by Pete and his companions in the act of stealing the fish. They are pursued in a boat. Jennie watches their progress from the land through a marine glass. When she sees in the distance the thief knock Pete over into the water she raises a rifle and shoots him. When brought ashore the dead robber turns out to be her own husband. She is therefore enabled to marry Pete.

THOU SHALT NOT RUBBER (Oct. 11).—Willie's mother finds that her opera cloak needs renovating and sends Willie to the cleaner's with it. Willie, on the way, tries to steal some peanuts and is forced to run after a scuffle with the irate vendor. The parcel bursts open and Willie carries the cloak over his arm. He finds a forgotten parasol on a park bench, and the day being warm, he places the cloak over his shoulders and opens the parasol. Schmaltz sees Willie's back view and imagines he is a young woman showing a great deal of one of her legs. He steals away from Mrs. Schmaltz and follows Willie down the street. Casey is attracted and joins Schmaltz, as do the blind men, the Rube and the stout person with the gout. Willie leads them to the park, and the wives and Willie's mother go to hunt for their absent ones. Willie manages to finally lead the boys to the park pond, where he discloses the trick, and the "rubberers" all fall into the water in surprise. The mother takes Willie away, and Mrs. Schmaltz and Mrs. Casey keep their husbands ducking until they promise they will never rubber again.

BISON.

THE GIRL AND THE TIGER (3 parts—Oct. 7).—The resident of Gansoor, who is responsible to the British Government for the happenings in the Kingdom of the Maharajah, receives a visit from a friend, Lieutenant Clifford of the U. S. Navy. He is sumptously entertained by the Maharajah and falls in love at first sight with that ruler's favorite Nautch girl, Zabanna. They meet clandestinely and are observed by Hyzan Singh, who informs the Maharajah of the happening. The Maharajah declares that the lieutenant must die, but is afraid to act for fear of the reprisals which must come at the hands of the British. He plots with the Nahuni, a jealous Nautch girl, who is responsible for showing Hyzan the clandestine meetings.

The lieutenant is invited to participate in a tiger hunt and readily agrees. At the last moment the Maharajah pleads stress of business and the lieutenant goes alone with the Hyzan and a few beaters. The tigers are seen in the excitement. It is easy to persuade Lieutenant Clifford to take one direction, whilst the wily Hyzan awaits the return of the beaters who accompany Clifford and desert him when his attention is directed to the big game at hand. They all return to the Maharajah and report their complete success and are overheard by Zabanna, who decides to go to the rescue of her lover. The lieutenant comes upon three tigers and at once they turn upon him, and he barely reaches a cabin made of jungle grass and gets intide when the beasts are at his heels and springing at the door. He struggles to hold the frail door against their savage rushes and looks around to face a huge cobra which is about to strike him. He fires through the door and the tigers run away frightened and killing the reptile as it strikes at him.

He gets outside in an exhausted condition, and he discovers he is lost and spends the night in a cabin in fear. In the meantime the Nautch girl has bribed one of the beaters with jewels to take her to where Clifford was left. They hunt the night through and Zabanna separates from the beater for a while. In so doing she stumbles upon the lair of the tigers and when they attack her, she crawls into a hollow log and fires at the brutes as they enter the log after her. Half fainting she wonders what to do. Clifford hears the shot and finds her as the beater also comes up attracted by the shot. Zabanna is afraid to return, but Clifford tells her that the British residents will protect her and they go together.

FIGHTERS OF THE PLAINS (2 parts—Oct 11).—As John and Mary and their little daughter, Doris, were crossing the plains, they were seen by Blue Mountain, brother of Chief Little Bear, and as the game had nearly all left that part of the country on account of the dry season, the Indians were hungry and here was a chance to get food. Accordingly, Blue Mountain, with a few braves, attacked the prairie schooner, but so gallantly did John, Mary and their friends defend their little store of supplies that the Indians were forced to retire, not, however, until they had lost two or three and Blue Mountain, who had climbed into the wagon had been severely wounded and carried away in the wagon.

At the cabin, which Bert had gone ahead to prepare, Blue Mountain was discovered, but Doris pleaded so earnestly for his life that they took him inside, dressed his wounds and kept him in the cabin until he was able to return to his tribe. In the meanwhile, he and Doris had become fast friends indeed when the brave returned after giving the child a necklace, which he had made himself. Doris watching until her mother was away slipped out and attempted to follow the Indian. Instead, she met a number of braves out hunting and they recognizing the necklace, believed that Blue Mountain had been killed by the whites.

Lone Eagle took the child to the camp while the others hastened to the settler's cabin took what supplies they could find and burned it to the ground. At the camp, Chief Little Bear would not allow them to harm the child, and right glad was he, when Blue Mountain arrived to tell the kindness of the whites. Blue Mountain insists upon returning the child to her parents, but when he reaches the cabin of the whites, however, he finds the place in ashes, and the mother and the father had already left that part of the country. Believing Doris to have been burned in the cabin, Blue Mountain returns her to the tribe, where she is adopted and rapidly grows into womanhood.

Twelve years pass. Blue Mountain has become Chief upon the death of his brother, and now strongly favored a match between Doris and his nephew, White Hawk. Doris, however, loved Jack Seaton, who lived on a ranch near where the tribe are now camping, and refuses to marry White Hawk. He becomes suspicious of here and follows, sees her meet Jack and waylays Jack on his way back to the ranch.

A fight takes place between White Hawk and Jack, ending in the death of White Hawk. As soon as Blue Mountain learns this, he holds a war dance and starts for the settlers; but having been advised of his approach the settlers were prepared and won a decided victory, resulting in the death of Blue Mountain, not, however, until he has recognized Mary and John and told them that Doris is their daughter.

his wife. Bess, the sheriff's wife, pleads in vain. The two men set out. Bess quickly saddles her horse and rides to warn Nellie, and by exchanging clothes with Joe's wife, leads her husband on the wrong trail. The plan succeeds and while Nellie and Joe rode safely away, the sheriff and his men waited patiently by the bushes where Bess had deposited a bag of food to mislead the officers of the law.

THE LOVE TRAIL (Oct. 8).—Frank Wilton, coming West, arrives on the day his father is killed by Tango, a half-breed sheep tender. The cowboys on the ranch form a posse and go in pursuit of Tango. They chase him several days and get him cornered before he can reach the line. Wilton learns that Tango will attempt to stop at Judge Denton's home. He orders the posse to wait for him while he goes on to the house to investigate. There he meets Lillian Denton, the judge's daughter. He tells her he is Tango and demands that she hide him from the posse which is chasing him, which she does. The real Tango arriving, Wilton captures him and he is taken to jail. Several days later Tango escapes from jail.

Wilton and Lillian meet on the trial Lillian, returning home, overhears the judge and John West planning to blow up the roadway which Wilton will have to pass when taking his cattle to market. Mounting her horse she rides off and arrives in time to warn Wilton of his danger just before the road is blown up He thanks her and leaves John West, lying in wait for the results of the explosion, confronts Lillian and a struggle ensues. She draws her gun, and just as she shoots him (as she supposes) a shot rings out and West falls. Thinking she has killed West, she mounts her horse and flees for home Wilton, hearing the shot, arrives on the scene after she has left. He is beside the body of West when the sheriff and posse, in pursuit of Tango, comes upon the scene. They arrest Wilton and take him to the sheriff's office.

Lillian, who has seen the posse in the distance on her way home, also rides to the sheriff's office, and confesses to the deed herself. Judge Denton, her father, who is also present, signs bonds for her release, and, upon arriving at home, examines the gun which Lillian used in shooting West. He discovers that it is one of the guns loaded with blank cartridges which the men use in rounding up the sheep. The judge denounces her, accuses her of taking the blame when she is not guilty and orders her from the house. Lillian determining to tell Wilton what she has done and of her father's accusation, rides to his home, and upon hearing of her father's injustice, Wilton asks her to become his wife. They immediately set out for the parson's home.

In the meantime Judge Denton rides to town and tells the sheepman of his daughter's duplicity to save Wilton. They form a posse and meet Wilton and Lillian returning from the parson's home, where they have been married. The posse take Wilton and hurry him away to mete out Western justice in punishment of his supposed crime. Lillian hurries back to the parson's home to secure his aid, and arrives there just as Tango (who had been severely wounded by the posse in pursuit of him), signs his dying confession to the killing of John West from ambush. Lillian and the parson call for the sheriff, and the three ride to the saloon where the sheepmen are about to mob Frank Wilton. Explanations are made and Judge Denton forgives his daughter and welcomes Frank to his home.

THE SIMPLE LIFE (Oct. 10).—Sidney Chapin and Virginia Bradley get married to Sidney's friends. He tells them he is tired of fast living and intends to live the simple life. He invites them down to spend the day at the cottage he has rented in the country. In the meantime, Sidney and his pretty bride are enjoying themselves spending the days riding and spooning. They have their meals under the trees, waited on by a servant. One day the three chums arrive and, passing a very pretty girl, wonder who she is. They arrive at the cottage and make merry, but they discover the door of one of the rooms locked, and Sidney tells them it is the room of the old housekeeper who looks after his wants. They are suspicious, and when they go to leave, are shown into a spare room which Sidney says is his bedroom. As he goes to see them off, one of them runs back, and taking up a handful of silverware from the table, places it in the bed of Sidney's supposed room. Sidney enters and misses the silverware, and thinking they have taken it for a joke waits some days before writing. When he does write, he gets a reply to the effect that he ought to have found it, as it is between the sheets of his bed. He writes confessing he is on his honeymoon, and tells them anybody but a donkey knew that matrimony means the "simple life."

FRONTIER.

WHEN FATHER GOES TO CHURCH (Oct. 9).—Silas Hicks, the father of Dotty, has not been to church for ten years, and objects to not only the minister courting his daughter, but the minister insisting with the help of the wife and daughter that he go to church. The wife begins to be very forceful and the husband decides to try to go to church. The mother and daughter with great difficulty succeed to getting father ready for church on Sunday morning. Sal, the hired girl, is intrusted to tell Bill, the hired man, to hitch up. Bill attempts the feat. The horse is frisky and runs away. Bill calls for help. Sal responds. Sal and Bill are gone so long that father starts after them and sees that instead of looking for the horse they are making love in true country style. They break away stumbling and falling over each other. The farmer, failing to catch them, decides to hitch up an extra horse himself. After more difficulties the father, mother and Dotty start for the church. When they reach the church they find that it has been closed by order of the Board of Health because of smallpox in the immediate neighborhood. Just at this moment the minister comes around the corner of the church and tells them all about it. Dotty gets her mother to ask the minister to dinner. The minister accepts the invitation.

In the meantime, Sal and Bill have caught the runaway horse and decide that the best thing to do is for them to go to the Justice of the Peace and get married. Pa and Ma and Dotty and the minister arrive home. Finding a note pinned on the door left by Sal, which reads: "Bill and I have gone to get married. I'll wash the dishes when I get back, Sal," the quick wit of the minister comes to Pa's aid. The minister tells father that he will see that Sal and Bill are brought back. He whispers to Dotty and while father is busy they rush to the buggy and drive away to the home of the justice. They are just in the nick of time and instead of one couple the Justice of the Peace has two couples to marry. In the meantime, Ma sends Pa to the barn to hitch up the old mare. A short distance down the road they meet the young people coming along, and as they draw closer dad starts to take the whip and jumps out of the buggy to chastise the young fellows when Ma takes a hand. She insists upon handling the matter herself. The minister realizes that something must be done and he ties his handkerchief to the whip as a flag of truce, ready to make terms. Pa is pacified after much trouble and all ends happily.

HARMONY AND DISCORD (Oct. 11).—Tom Gorman's fondness for glee clubs and fast company causes his father to disown him. After a severe arraignment, Tom boards a train and heads for the West, where he seeks employment on a ranch. Whatever Tom lacks in skill as a cowboy he certainly makes up for it by his playing of the mandolin, and many are the moments he enjoys in the company of Ella, the ranch owner's daughter, herself being a talented pianist.

Although young Horace Greeley is one of the wealthiest ranchmen throughout the country; he is the one man Ella utterly detests, but Horace has the approval of her parents, so his visits to her home are most welcome. During one of Horace's calls Ella is asked to play for him. Quickly she feigns illness and begs to be excused. Amazed at her sudden turn, the mother goes in search of her and finds Ella not suffering, but hugely enjoying the mandolin playing of the hired man. Ella is promptly taken in charge and compelled to return to the house where she is commanded by her father to play for Horace. Seeing no way out of it, she obeys very reluctantly. From the facial expressions of all it is quite evident that she has their consent to stop, her discords are murderous.

In the door of the bunk house, Tom is softly playing his mandolin when suddenly he hears something that causes a happy expression to light his sad face. He goes to a window of the ranch house and peers through the blinds. From her position at the piano, Ella sees the cowboy peering through the blinds, and suddenly inspired, she soon begins playing as she never played before. Totally oblivious, Tom soon forgets himself, and taking up his mandolin, begins playing in perfect accord with the piano. Horace is delighted and applauds Ella vigorously, while on the face of the father a bit of suspicion appears. Ella has finished, but the music continues. Going towards the window, Tom is discovered. An argument between the father and Tom results in the latter's discharge. In great rage the father, followed by Horace and Ella rushes to the bunk house. Horace is about to take the matter into his own hands when Ella quickly prevents and denounces him. Ella is sent to the house while the father pays Tom the wages due and orders him from the place. Tom and his offending mandolin depart. The father and Horace return to the house, but Ella is nowhere to be found. The cowboys and every man on the place is called and a pursuit of the couple begins. Ella overtakes Tom on a lonely road. An argument ensues over the ownership of the ring. Tom's suggestion, "Since we can't agree, let's be partners and own it together," is quickly assented to by Ella and they repair to a nearby parsonage.

After eight hours spent, the posse is just about to give up when all happen to hear the strains of a familiar mandolin, and stealing through the thick woods they surprise the happy young pair and arrest them. The certificate displayed by Ella upon their return home is promptly declared perfectly legal by old Sheriff Kent, who, seeing the humor of the situation, brings about the forgiveness desired.

"The Biggest and Best Film Renter in the World"

Of Course Our "SAPHO" is the Florence Roberts "SAPHO"! We Thought All You States-Rights Fellows Knew It!

For weeks we have been hammering away at you State-Right people with the information that OUR "SAPHO" was the famous Florence Roberts version of "Sapho," with Florence Roberts (herself) in the title role. Yet, because last week we didn't put Miss Roberts' name in black type all over the ad, a writer asks if this is the film the celebrated actress did at the New Majestic Studio! It assuredly is, with famous Shelly Hull at the head of the great supporting company.

While Morosco books "SAPHO" for his high-class California theatres a New York manager quietly prepares to "spring" it on Broadway convey her heartless young mistress's dismissal to the frowsy, tear stained laundress. Then Evelyn went shopping with her auntie and spent enough of her indulgent father's money to keep twenty laundresses in comfort for as many years. Gerald Collins was waiting when Evelyn returned, also a letter from her friend, Margaret Evers, asking Evelyn to a week's housewarming at her new country place. Gerald gladly consented to see Evelyn to the train the following week.

The East Coast isn't far behind the West Coast where a "good thing" theatrically is concerned. Just as Oliver Morosco, in California, starts "Sapho" on a tour of his houses, commencing at the beautiful Majestic Theatre, Los Angeles, a New York manager gets busy with the De Luxe Feature Company, owners of the New York rights, and arranges to slip it in on Broadway. And there is a Broadway in every city and town that has a theatre that is aching to book "Sapho." Why not acquire a state-right and get after these houses? The profit will be fine compensation for your work. Better come over, or send over, to our handy projection room on 14th Street, quick.

Evelyn's maid had been rebuked for carelessness, and so she sullenly followed Evelyn with the suit-case, handbag and jewel case when the little lady started for the house party. At the train, Evelyn was absorbed in Gerald. The maid, finding herself unnoticed, trickily ran back home, thinking to repay Miss Evelyn's unkindness by partly spoiling her trip. Evelyn arrived at her destination, and confused at not finding her maid, dropped her gold mesh bag. Her friend's new chauffeur had had a breakdown on the road, and then met with a convivial friend, so there was no one to meet her. Then, following the discovery of her lost purse, came a series of humiliating incidents which culminated in her being driven to the park for shelter that night. As she staggered to a bench, weak from anger, hunger and bewilderment, a tough accosted her. This was too much for Evelyn. She fainted. The tough immediately gave a signal whistle, to which a pal responded, and the two dragged Evelyn towards a nearby saloon.

Bob Harding, a young mechanic on his way from work, became suspicious when he saw the two tough-looking men dragging a limp girl down an alley. He cautiously followed. As the girl seemed unconscious, he entered the saloon and effected her rescue after a terrific struggle in which the place was well nigh wrecked. Bob carried Evelyn home to his mother, who nursed the fevered girl tenderly. Mrs. Evers confirmed their worst fears, and a search for her was instituted without apparent results. After a week she regained consciousness, her fever abating, and asked to have her father notified of her whereabouts. Bob, now in love with her, learned from a newspaper item that she was probably the missing Evelyn Harding, daughter of New York's wealthiest man. He immediately telegraphed Mr. Harding, who came with the haughty aunt and took her away, but not before the love crazed youth had kissed her madly in farewell.

Evelyn in her mansion thought only of Bob. When Gerald Collins, whom she had favored before her mishap, proposed, she burst into tears. Bob in his humble home thought only of Evelyn. In his agony he kept calling for her. Finally the doctor wrote her. Evelyn, in defiance of father and aunt came to him, and he became too mend immediately. She wired her father asking his consent to their marriage. He wired disinheritance unless she would return alone and at once. She waited and brought Bob back with her. Dame fortune kindly gave him an opportunity to save Mr. Harding in a crisis and he then gladly gave his consent to Evelyn's marriage with one of "the Rabble."

PRIVATE BOX 23 (Oct. 5).—"The fatal letter" (addressed "Private Box 23"), is found by young Mrs. Jones in Mr. Jones' pocket, who in turn had found it on the sidewalk. Mrs. Jones reads in consternation that "Tweetie" was pining to see her "Goliah," whose "wife is a cat, but never mind, dear." To say Mrs. Jones became infuriated is putting it mildly. Jones came back smiling to get the coat she had been sewing for him. She threw it at his head and refused to listen to any explanations. Then waving the fatal letter at her speechless husband, Mrs. Jones immediately flounced home to mother. Mother was all sympathy, assuring her poor child that all men were bad, and things might have been worse anyway. Father thereupon transferred his sympathy to Jones, who had come in to ask Mrs. Jones' parents to act as peacemakers. Jones wrote Private Box 23 asking him to appear and clear up the misunderstanding. Mrs. Jones called at the post-office, showed the fatal letter addressed to Private Box 23 and got Jones' pathetic letter. She sat down in the park to kiss it, but an excited man following her claimed it as his and cleared up the difficulty. Mrs. Jones ran to her Jonesy and they were having a happy reunion when the big cook blustered in. On seeing the letter she seized it with a happy cry. The excited man rushed in. He and cook cried simultaneously "Tweetie!" "Goliah!" And peace settled once more on the Jones household.

POLPHS (Oct. 5).—In a series of exquisitely tinted pictures, the fantastic formation, delicate coloring and manner of life of Polyps are shown here. Partaking of characteristics both of the animal and vegetable kingdom, the polyp is frequently mistaken for a plant. Especially so with the species Anemone, which, with its thousand tentacles, strikingly resembles a giant chrysanthemum's petals. These petals are its means of sustaining life, for they seize upon prey relentlessly, drawing it slowly but surely down into the heart of the Anemone, where it is devoured by a process of crushing. Some species of the Polyp are protected by ridges of thorns. The shell of another is composed of minute living "flowers." Most of the varieties can be found inhabiting the Atlantic.

A PITFALL OF THE INSTALMENT PLAN (2 parts—Oct. 6).—Steve Martin had a reputation of being a good workman, but he is unable to secure employment, and his once beautiful home is replaced by quarters in a cheaper section and the good clothing the family was wont to wear is now almost in rags.

Through the intervention of an apparent stranger, he is offered a position as foreman of a concrete mixing crew on a new structure being erected for a local department store, under the provision that he obey orders that might be issued to him by the boss of the concrete workers. He is engaged for the position at a salary of $16 per week and is apparently making good. One day he finds one of his crew using too little cement. By investigating he unearths graft, and is offered to be taken in on the deal, but upon his refusal he is discharged. He then returns to his home where the hopes of the wife of getting back to their old station in life to better clothes and better meals are all but realized. Steve has not the heart to impart the sad news and he keeps it to himself wandering about the town each day in the vain hope of securing other employment.

In the meantime his wife visits the department store where she purchases liberally and arranges to pay for the goods on the instalment plan, signing a statement that her husband is employed at the stated salary by the concern in question as foreman of the concrete mixers. She is given her goods and her statement is investigated. This, of course, is found untrue, and her arrest follows as a matter of course. Her pleadings with the officers and her accusers are in vain and she is hurried off to the city jail, from where she sends a hurried note to her husband, informing him of her dire distress. The police matron carries the note to the captain, where it is opened and between them it is decided to destroy the note.

In the meantime the children locked up in the home grow tired and wearisome and as the day is growing darker, a lamp is lit with the customary results of an explosion, from which the timely arrival of the father rescues the children. From them he learns the destination of the wife. He traces her to the station, but is denied an interview with her until the case is called in the court on the morning of the next day.

At the trial the department store offers the boss of the job as a witness to testify that Steve was discharged because of drunkenness. This Seve, of course, strongly denies and in turn states the true reason for his discharge. Upon the foreclosure of this evidence the suit is dropped by the complainant.

Steve now engages an attorney and together they appear at the office of the department store, where a claim is made for damages because of false imprisonment. The claim is adjusted by payment of $1,000 and a promise of a position. Steve's claim of fraud is carefully investigated and proven, whereupon he is put in charge of the work and the guilty man is apprehended and prosecuted.

TAMING A COWBOY (Oct. 9).—Two years after Bill Houghton had settled on his ranch out West, he received a letter from his sister Jessie, a physician, telling him of her intended visit. Bill was delighted at the thought of a visit, but was interested to know how his partner, Bob Churchill, who is of a very bashful disposition, would take to the presence of a woman.

On the morning that the physican was expected to arrive, word was received that cattle rustlers had made their appearance, so Bill rushes off with the cowboys to apprehend the invaders, but leaves word for Bob to go to the depot to meet his sister. Bob is agreeably surprised at the appearance of Bill's sister, and in the course of the first few days manages to overcome his bashfulness and is wishing for a protracted stay of the doctor.

Things are progressing beautifully when word is received that one Dr. Boynton, a friend of Bill's sister, will join her for a short rest. Bob's jealousy is immediately aroused and he becomes sullen and disagreeable.

In a subsequent encounter with the cattle rustlers, Bob is injured and brought back to the ranch. When the doctor attempts to dress his wounds, Bob objects and sarcastically requests that Dr. Boynton be sent for. But Jessie Houghton remains master of the situation by forcing her services Under her skillful care Bob soon becomes convalescent, but when she rides to town to call for Dr. Boynton, Bob still harbors his jealousy and refuses to accompany her.

In taking a ride later he is shocked to come upon the doctor's horse apparently running away. Bob calls to some of the cowboys to follow and a chase to rescue Jessie is on The dreaded accident occurs and Bob is the first to reach the overturned vehicle and rescue Jessie from under it. One of the other cowboys is sent to the station to bring Dr. Boynton whose services are apparently needed at once When all have returned to the ranch, Bob meets his dreaded rival, who proves to be a lady physician He feels mortified beyond expression at his own conduct.

Jessie comes to his aid in relieving the situation, and in the ensuing scenes love interest on the part of Bill and Dr. Boynton develops in rapid stages. Very shortly there is an announcement of two weddings. Henceforth the Eveless Eden is amply supplied by the two charming physicians.

CALAMITY ANNE'S SACRIFICE (Oct. 11).—Calamity Anne, having returned from her disastrous trip to Venice and encountering no further adventures after her rescue of the millionaire baby, in order to recoup her losses goes to prospecting in the mountains near her home. Here she finds lots of work, but no returns from the mine.

A moving picture concern comes to the city and establishes a studio planning on using the wild and beautiful scenery of the neighborhood. One of the actors, together with his invalid sister, buys a home here, assumes the mortgage and believes that the bracing air of the city will prove beneficial to his invalid sister.

Jimmy goes into the mountains in a scene in which he plays bandit and the location selected is near Calamity Anne's claim. She witnesses the scene and believing the bandit real and the company a bunch of outlaws, she rushes the gang, severely wounding Jimmy When the situation is explained to her, she is all contrition and demands that the injured actor be carried to her home. The director of the company, who has a hatred for the wounded man, returns to town and purchases the mortgage on the former's home and forces a sheriff's sale. Calamity Anne visits the studio on the behalf of the man she has injured and gives the director a good trouncing On her claim she strikes pay dirt and having it assayed, is offered two thousand dollars for it if she will hold it two weeks. But the sheriff's sale will take place the next day, so she refuses the offer, returns to the injured actor, brings him home and arrives just in time for the sale. The offer of her claim in exchange for the mortgage is accepted.

RELIANCE.

HEARTS OF THE DARK (Sept. 29).—Edith is a model in a fashionable modiste's shop. She has to wear gorgeous gowns all day, and at night she returns to her child who is dying. Mrs. Devereaux comes into the shop on her way to the beach with her boy. The night before the doctor told Edith that her child must be sent away for the summer or it will die. Edith sees Mrs D's purse which she has left behind and as she is about to restore it she has a vision of Mrs. D's child on the beach and her own in the torrid room. She takes the purse, but the forewoman discovers her. Mrs. D does not want to press the charge, but the store insists on doing so to protect its patrons. Edith is sent to the reformatory and her child to an asylum. Mag, an inmate of the reformatory, befriends her. Mrs. D secures Edith's parole and lends her one hundred dollars. But Edith finds that when she applies for her child she cannot have her, as the court has decreed that she is an improper guardian Unable to stand the child's cries for its mother, she uses a part of the money to hire a car and steal the child. She takes it to a farm, where its health is restored. Spending his vacation on the farm is Dick, an electrician. He and she fall in love, but she will not marry him. Confronted by the fact that her money is all gone she yields to his love and marries him. They return to the city. Meantime, Mag has been released and meets her pal, Bill, a crook. In the Grand Central Station Bill and Mag meet Edith and Dick. Mag recognizes Edith. Bill's telephone is out of order in his flat and an electrician is sent for He is Dick. Mag recognizes him as being with Edith and tells him that she is a friend of Edith. Dick invites her to call. Bill does some crooked work and has to have money to escape Mag has none. He tells her to go out and get it. Dick has in his possession the fund of a Benevolent Society to pay for the funeral of a comrade By stratagem Mag discovers from Edith that this money is in the desk. She tells Edith that if she does not give her the money she will denounce her to the police and she will have to go back to prison and her child to the asylum. Edith is about to do so when she thinks of Dick and what it would mean to him. She is struggling with Mag when she sees Dick and calls to him. Mag tells him of Edith's past anl that she will have the money or denounce his wife. He decides that he can stand a prison term better than his wife and gives Mag the money. Edith in despair calls the police and gives herself up as an escaped convict. She is about to part from Dick when they learn that Mrs. D has secured a pardon for Edith the day before she broke her parole and that they cannot hold her.

LOVE ME, LOVE MY DOG (Sept. 14).—Fred returns to his Los Angeles home to find his wife caring more for her dog than the care of the house. He decides to leave for the East and rid himself of such surroundings. Packing in a hurry, "Bud," the valet, by mistake gets one of Mrs Fred's gowns. The wife, hearing them making their escape, goes to investigate and discovers her gown missing. She immediately comes to the conclusion that her husband has flown with another woman. She decides to go to mother in New York. Unfortunately, hubby and wifey catch the same train. While enjoying the scenery on the observation car, Bud flirts with a girl, whom Fred also flirts with. Bud plans revenge. He places Mrs. Fred's gown in Fred's seat. Fred loses the charmer and the valet gets a sound thrashing. Bud starts a search for a new girl and is very successful. This time he becomes friendly with a blonde beauty. Fred is unaware of the valet's doings until arriving at Albuquerque, where Bud is once more discovered by Fred, he is forced to give up for the second time. On their arrival at Chicago, Fred takes the blonde to dinner. His wife receives an invitation to dine and decides that if her husband can flirt, so can she, and she has the same privilege. She accepts the invitation. On returning to the train, Fred discovers his wife getting aboard with her friend and, mad with jealousy, he joins them,

FRED'S TRAINED NURSE (Sept. 21).—Strolling through the streets one day, Fred meets a trained nurse. She doesn't encourage flirting outside the hospital, but once inside, she condescends to give him a smile. Instantly Fred starts to scheme how to see her again. An idea strikes him. He will take poison. His intentions are good, but the drug clerk is suspicious, and substitutes milk for carbolic acid, of which Fred drinks. He falls in the street, but finding he only drank milk, he has to scheme some more. He goes to his club and there meets his pals, who swear secrecy. They go to the street and bribe a chauffeur to run over him. They drive to a quiet country road and get everything in readiness. Fred gathers all his courage and stands in the road. The machine comes up, but Fred's heart fails him. He promises if they will try once more he will keep his word. Once again he jumps away only to let the machine go past. He is given one more chance. This time he waits until the machine passes, then falls in the road. His companions load him into the machine and take him to the hospital. Arriving at the hospital he is taken to a ward, where he meets his nurse. Everything is lovely until the club boys call on him and see the nice nurse. At once an epidemic hits the club. The members one by one take sick. Fred gets worse in order to have more attention. His nurse holds a hot water bottle to his head, and leaves to attend the other patients. As soon as she is gone, Fred lights a cigarette and removes the bottle. Everything is fine until the nurse comes back. His first idea is to get rid of the cigarette. The only hiding place is under the covers. There it goes. It sets fire to the bed clothing, whereupon Fred takes flight down the hall only to be captured by the doctors and his nurse, who "squares" it by saying he is out of his mind. The other boys arrive and are given wards. That night, when all is quiet, the boys start on a tour of the hospital. They find the nurses in the sun room dancing. The boys join them. The grouchy old doctor, when making his rounds, hears what is going on and decides to fix the matter up. He discharges all the nice nurses, and puts the scrub women in their places. Next morning when the boys wake up, they find the scrub women holding their hands—"take their pulse." They all feel better instantly. There is an exodus of club members from the hospital. And what of Fred and the prettiest nurse? Well, they figured in the funny finish, never fear!

THE SPEED BEAR (Sept. 28).—Fred is constantly hanging around automobile row and as time passes he becomes a nuisance. One day while loitering around the different garages he sees the racing cars starting for the tracks trying out for the Santa Monica Road Race. In order to mingle with the drivers, Fred purchases some driver's clothes and goes to the tracks. There he meets Barney Oldfield, Earle Cooper and other famous drivers, who encourage him by talking to him. When returning home Fred decides he will ask father for a car. He does. Father calls for the "Speed Bear," an antique, and has it delivered for Fred. He is very proud. He takes pictures of it in order to supply all his friends. That night he hears that the automobile club is holding its weekly dinner, and now that he is an owner, he decides to attend. He arrives late, but manages to show all the guests and members his new machine. After several intrusions, the boys frame Fred to enter his car in the races. Fred falls for it, and takes his car to the tracks the next day. The boys tell Fred that this is the day of the real road race and he has his machine in fine shape. The boys start him off on the course accompanied by other cars and drivers. Fred takes desperate chances on death curves and down the home stretch. He wins the Santa Monica Race, in his mind, for it is really held the next day. A friend of Fred's has heard of the race just on, so he warns Fred and the two lose no time in getting to the track. They just get in the front of the stand, as Cooper wins the race. The crowd try to chase Fred from the track, but he will not go until he can be accompanied by some of the other cars. They all leave.

On the way one of the racing machines breaks down and has to pay Fred real money to be drawn home. Everything is going fine until they run on the second car. He offers Fred more money than the first, so Fred thinks that a fair exchange is no robbery. He drops the first unfortunate, and picks up the second, leaving number one on the road cursing. Finally when Fred arrives home he finds father uneasy, but easily quieted when he looks at Fred's roll, and finds Fred willing to divide.

THE FARMER'S DAUGHTERS (Sept. 28).—Every year, it seems, the poor old farmer has more trouble to secure "hands." A Nebraska agriculturalist, who came East looking for workers, found his errand fruitless. In despair he offered that men who worked for him would be given a chance to court the farmer's two pretty daughters, and there would be no objection to a match on the father's part if the girls were willing. It was the dull season for news and the papers made much of the happening. The notice fell under the eyes of two college boys who were wondering how they would be able to get through the season until classes resumed without any money or food. They saw a chance to secure romance together with three square meals a day, and when they called upon the farmer and he showed them the pictures of his two beautiful daughters they gladly accepted his offer. The youths traveled West together, the farmer remaining behind hoping to land other "hands." Unfortunately for the boys, the farmer's daughters had seen the notices in the papers, and so objected to being made matrimonial prizes. They rigged up in strange clothing and made themselves as homely and unattractive as possible. The new farm hands thought them frights and tried to run away. The girls were true to father, however, and held them prisoners. Of course all ended happily, but not until the boys had some mighty unpleasant experiences.

LIFE'S PATHWAY (2 parts—Sept. 30).—A poor widow who lived in a cheap tenement supported her infant daughters (twins) by sewing. She was happy while her strength lasted, but when stricken with a fatal illness, she worried for the future of her children. Her neighbors were poor, but kindhearted, and two women each agreed to bring up one of the little orphans. Thus were they separated in childhood before they really knew each other. In later years the pathways were widely diverged. Anna's foster parents became wealthy and she was brought up in luxury, while Bessie never enjoyed any of the comforts of wealth. Prosperity spoiled Anna, however. She was grasping as a youngster and grew up with the one desire to make a wealthy marriage and scorned the idea of love. Bessie, on the other hand, studied hard to improve herself, became a trained nurse and with a heart full of sympathy for the poor, did what she could to make their lives happier.

Anna married a broker, believed to be a millionaire, while Bessie was beloved by the unfortunates whom she met in her work. Later a Refuge for Women was established, and Bessie gladly accepted a position as superintendent. The broker was not as wealthy as he had pretended, and the extravagance of his wife prevented him from making headway. Finally the crash came. To avoid imprisonment the broker fled under an assumed name, and his wife found herself penniless. Her idle existence caused her to sink lower and lower. One evening a human derelict, bearing traces of former womanly beauty, fell fainting at the door of the Refuge. The unfortunate was taken inside, but despite the best of care she passed away, still unconscious. Bessie bent over her, then looked up in bewilderment. "This poor woman reminds me of someone I once knew," she said to the nurses, "but I cannot recall her. If we fail to locate her friends I will see that she is not buried in Potter's Field." Thus did the sisters meet on Life's Pathway, yet they did not know each other.

THE TWINS AND THE OTHER GIRL (Oct. 3).—The twin sisters loved each other dearly, but their parents almost constantly quarreled. Affairs went from bad to worse, and finally there was a separation, each parent being given the custody of one child. After that they lived apart, although in the same village, but the little girls would steal out of their homes and meet by stealth, for their separation was a bitter trial to them. One day when they were about to part, "the other little girl" came along. She was a neighbor's child and asked them what was the matter. They told her they "had been divided up" because their parents had quarreled, whereupon the "other girl" remarked that her father and mother were very cross with each other. The twins, then, warned her not to permit a divorce for the children were always divided and in the case of only one child like "the other little girl" she probably would have to be chopped up. This statement worried the only child and she went home in tears. In their silly quarrels the parents had never considered what might become of the child and they resolved to curb their temper. Her own sorrows settled "the other little girl" found time to devote to the case of the twins. Accident aided and by an unusual ruse she brought them together.

MAJESTIC.

THE LOVE OF CONCHITA (Sept. 28).—On carnival night Conchita throws confetti on one of the maskers. A flirtation follows, and both remove their masks for a moment. The attraction is mutual, and when Conchita is escorted home by her suitor, Miguel, the masked stranger follows. Conchita throws him a rose, which action arouses the jealousy of Miguel. Later the stranger, who is Ramirez, the outlaw, leaves his stronghold and risks capture for the sake of seeing Conchita again. Lovers vows are exchanged, but he leaves her hurriedly when he sees Miguel approaching. Miguel makes love to Conchita and is repulsed. However, Conchita's father insists that she marry Miguel. She refuses, and as a result is locked in her room.

When Ramirez comes the following evening Conchita sees him from her window, and, writing a note, pins it to her fan and throws it to him. He reads it by the aid of a lighted match, and is about to help her escape when Miguel, who has been watching from the shrubbery, attempts to stab him. A struggle ensues; Miguel is slightly wounded and Ramirez escapes. The next day Conchita's father takes her some distance to the home of a friend. On their way they are held up by Ramirez, who is partially masked. Discovering the identity of the travelers he releases them, not, however, before Conchita recognizes her fan in his belt, as well as the stranger himself, Ramirez the outlaw. Later Conchita learns that her father and Miguel, heading a posse, are going in search of Ramirez. She rides to warn him and arrives just as Ramirez receives a mortal wound. He kisses the cross Conchita holds before him and expires. Some time after Conchita accedes to her father's request and consents to become the wife of Miguel.

WHEN THE DEBT WAS PAID (Sept. 30).—Dr. Merton was known as "the poor man's doctor," for he was ever ready to serve those in illness who were unable to pay for medical attention. Thus his presence in poor quarters aroused no attention, and the fact that he was in reality the leader of a band of counterfeiters was not even suspected. Sergeant Casey received orders from the chief of police to hunt down the counterfeiters. For a long time they eluded his vigilance, but finally one of them was arrested while trying to pass some of "the bad money," and, subjected to a grilling "third degree," confessed. Plans were immediately made to raid the counterfeiters' den that night.

The counterfeiters were surprised and captured with the exception of the leader, who escaped to the roof. The seargeant pursued, but when he gained the roof could see nothing of the fugitive. After a long search he suddenly realized that the man might have concealed himself in one of the houses. His own home was in a nearby house, only a few feet away, and he decided to search there first. Casey descended the ladder to the hallway below and opened the doorway of his flat. The fugitive was there, talking to his wife and child. The sergeant covered him with his revolver and ordered him to leave the room with him. The man started to obey, when his wife and child interfered. "He saved Edna's life," the woman sobbed, "and you can't take him to prison." Then the detective recognized his prisoner as the doctor who had stood between his child and death several weeks previous. He fought a bitter fight between duty and his debt to the fugitive, but when his men came to his home to find him he was able to say calmly, "I have searched my home and the man is not here." They saluted and withdrew to search vainly for the fugitive elsewhere. Dr. Merton went West and established a prosperous practice there. He never returned to his former illegal business.

A MAN OF THE WILDERNESS (Oct. 4).—The young trapper was an excellent example of the primitive man, tender in his love, fierce in his hate. The girl was pretty and a coquette. She was fully aware of the admiration of the sturdy woodsman, but chose to flirt with him. A young man from the city had come to visit the girl's father. He was handsome and his courtly ways were in marked contrast with the rough manners of the stalwart woodsman. The girl was greatly attracted, and persuaded herself that she loved him. The trapper, angry and revengeful, went into the wilderness to forget.

Fate put an instrument into his hands and he did not hesitate to use it. The successful suitor, while on a hunting trip, fell into a bear trap, and lay there a helpless prisoner. The trapper chanced to discover his plight, but did not attempt to release him. Instead, he went to the girl's home, and, telling her that her sweetheart was in danger, brought her to the spot. Half mad with jealousy, he did not realize his cruelty. He refused to release his rival, saying that he would let him die. The girl, knowing that another day in the bear pit would be her fiancé's last, told the trapper that she would marry him as the price of his freedom. The trapper assented, freed the other man and brought him safely back to the little village.

Life in the wilderness creates great passions. Hate and jealousy are two of them, but among others are love and compassion. As the time passed the trapper saw how the girl grieved. Love and compassion conquered the two ugly sentiments and he released her from her promise, leaving her free to marry his rival. The wedding day drew nearer, and the idea of marrying her grew more and more distasteful. A few hours before the wedding he disappeared, leaving a note in which he said that he did not care to marry her and was leaving for the East. He did not leave as soon as he expected, for he was intercepted at the railway station by the trapper.

The man of the wilderness disliked his rival, but the girl he loved had chosen him as her future mate, and that was sufficient for him. He seized the recreant groom-elect by the collar and hustled him to the girl's home. There the bride was being consoled by the assembled guests. The two men entered and the trapper, eyeing the city man, said that the ceremony would now begin. The groom was quite ready—fear made him so—but the bride was not. She had experienced a change of heart since the true natures of the two men had been revealed to her. Scornfully she ordered the city man from her home. The guests followed him and she was left alone with the man whom she had flouted. Clumsily he tried to comfort her. His manner wasn't at all worthy, but the girl realized the chivalrous spirit that underlay his rough demeanor. Another wedding took place in a very short time. The girl married the man who had always cared for her, and never regretted having chosen for a husband a man of the wilderness.

HOW MABEL CAUGHT A MAN (Sept. 26).—Mabel's mistress goes away for a long vacation, and Mabel goes out arrayed in her mistress's best clothes. She meets a howling swell, and they have some refined pleasure. Mabel has great hopes of capturing the heart of the rich stranger. He, in his turn, has an eye to pecuniary gain. When Mabel finds out that her suitor is only a common servant, masquerading in his master's clothes, her indignation knows no bounds. Later on the servant discovers the deception that Mabel played upon him. But all's well that ends well, says the magistrate, who advises the two prisoners to try and settle their differences out of court. That is how Mabel caught a man, for following the judge's advice, she decides to marry her lover, even though she first met him disguised in borrowed plumes.

MARY'S NEIGHBOR (Oct. 3).—Mary seeks the quietude of her study in order to become conversant with the many complex phases of the great problem of the Enfranchisement of Women. The young man next door is busy hanging up a mirror which he has purchased to beautify his room. In his violent efforts to knock a great nail into the wall he smashes his mirror and consequently becomes the possessor of seven years' bad luck. Fate is not long in dealing it out to him, for he tumbles through the hole he has made in the wall, sees Mary and falls in love with her. They are betrothed. Mary attends to the distribution of such presents as fate showers upon the unlucky head of her captive.

CONVICT 337 (Sept. 20).—James incurs the enmity of his uncle. The reason for this is because the young man hesitates to marry Olive von Silberstein. He loves a distant cousin, Edith, but Uncle Richard is adamant and insists upon having his way. In his dilemma, James consults his friend Horne, of the detective department, and the latter frames up a scheme to clear the atmosphere. The detective borrows a photograph of James and places it in the rogues gallery. Then he instructs a sergeant of police to carry to a reception on that same evening the police book and it is shown to Olive, who is greatly shocked when she recognizes her intended as the handsome young gentleman designated as Convict 337. An added shock is supplied to the assembled company when James is identified as the perpetrator of a capital offense.

Horne, the detective, has arranged all this, and he does not confide in James until matters begin to look serious. At a dinner party he is prompted how to play his part and he gives the impression to the guests that he is a madman and bent upon doing away with Olive and many other diners at the table. The ruse works so splendidly that James is looked upon as a gloomy criminal and in the garden he chases her in the guise of a bloodthirsty monster. In the meantime the love affair of James and Edith is progressing favorably and when the Silbersteins decide that James is an undesirable citizen, they make a hurried departure with their daughter and all ends happily.

TALE OF A CAT (Oct. 1).—Mr. Peters, living in the middle of a long city block, is alone one night, his wife having gone to the theater with some friends. At bedtime he is disturbed by the cat mewing to get out. He stands it for a while, then goes downstairs and opens the vestibule door to let the cat out. When he opens the outside door, the wind blows the inner door shut, and Mr. Peters finds himself locked out, clothed in his dressing-gown and slippers.

His only way of entrance is the back door, and to reach that he must go the length of the block, up a side street and over ten brick walls which separate the different back yards from each other. His wife will not be in till very late, so he decides that this is the quicker way, rather than shiver outside in his night clothes until her return.

As he starts out down the street his adventures are many, frightening policemen, falling upon burglar alarms, being set upon by dogs, etc., but he finally reaches his own back door, gets the key and crawls into the house a sorry sight to find his wife frantically hunting for him. His looks betray his plight, his wife laughs heartily, takes him down to the front vestibule and shows him the key which has been hanging within his reach all the time. They both laugh heartily over his absentmindedness.

THE LAME MAN (Oct. 3).—Two young seamen, Levering and Karr, are in love with the same girl, who is the waitress in the restaurant where they take their lunch when harboring in the home port. After they finish their meal one day, Levering, the least preferred of the suitors, attempts to kiss Jane. Karr becomes incited and both fight, but through Jane they become reconciled. Levering and Jane take a walk one day, but closely dogging their steps is a lame man. When Levering leaves Jane, the lame man accosts her and attempts assault. She slaps him in the face and runs. Infuriated, the lame man swears vengeance, and that night he stealthily goes to the ship and cuts the ropes of the hanging ladder or traveling scaffold. Next morning when Karr is going up the ladder, the ropes break and down he falls severely hurt. The lame man seizes the opportunity to shift the blame on Levering, Karr's rival. He tells Jane that Levering cut the ropes. Jane rushes to Levering's father, the lighthouse keeper, and tells of the happenings. The old man distinctly remembers looking toward the ship the night before, and seeing a lame man hobbling along with a knife, who stealthily cut the rope and crept away. They call the police and capture the lame man after a big chase in the hold of the boat. Karr becomes well again, and the young people are happily united.

THE DOCTOR'S SACRIFICE (Sept. 30).—Mr. and Mrs. Bristowe are entertaining a party of friends to dinner at their country residence, Briarwood, when one of the servants rushes in to tell them that their daughter, Lillie, has been taken suddenly ill. A hastily summoned nurse diagnoses the case as one of acute diphtheria. Mr. Bristowe, alarmed at the seriousness of the ailment with which their only child is stricken, telephones to Dr. Browne to come at once.

The doctor starts immediately in his automobile, but is seriously inconvenienced by a sudden breakdown. The urgency of the case determines him to take a short cut through the woods to Briarwood, as the way is easy for him. Unfortunately he trips over a fallen log, and his right hand is caught in a wolf-trap. Release is only possible by amputation of his fingers, and he sacrifices these in order to reach the child in time. The great sacrifice thus made enables him to successfully treat little Lillie's dread disease, and as the dawn breaks he is able to assure the tortured parents that their darling will recover.

Later on Lillie is playing with Dr. Browne, and seeing his right arm still bound up, it seems that she senses what a noble deed the doctor performed in the wood, and the child tenderly raises the stricken hand and presses her lips to it.

TINY TIM IN SOCIETY (Oct. 2).—Realizing that however successful he may be as a humorist, Tiny Tim's education has been sadly neglected in the deportment department, and efforts are made to remedy the omissions of the past. In polite company he does not behave at all nicely, and his first lessons are directed toward improving the manner in which he enters a room. At the end of the first lesson he shows distinct promise of improvement. It may be (and very probably is) that acquiescence suggests to him "the easiest way," but his mother at least is satisfied with the progress he has made, and on the following day ventures to allow Tiny Tim to come into the parlor where she is entertaining a few friends.

For a short time all goes well, but Tiny Tim wearies. The "At Home" is not sufficiently exciting for the youngster, and as he sits in a very easy chair he yawns, he gapes, his little mouth is stretched to its uttermost capacity. As is well known, yawning is a most contagious proceeding, and ere long all the guests are engaged in the very unbecoming process of mouth-stretching, with most dire results to Grandpa Binks

Granpa Binks gapes to such bad effect that he is seized with lockjaw, which a smart "upper cut" from a fellow guest fails to cure. It is left to Tiny Tim to restore the injured Grandpa Binks to his former normal condition. Leaving the parlor quietly, he returns with a handful of ice-fragments, which he flings violently into the face of the still-gaping Grandpa. The result is instantaneous, but Grandpa Binks is deeply offended, and his anger is not appeased until he has thrown the youngster violently into the street.

ATOM LIFE IN THE DEEP (Oct. 2).—The surface layer of the sea is peopled with an infinite number of little creatures incapable of moving long distances by their own movements and depending consequently on sea-currents for displacement. The name Plankton is given to this body of creatures and it is upon these that shoals of various fish depend for nourishment. On these tiny fish which compose Plankton the film gives a highly interesting description. The catching of them is a difficult matter, the silken net which is used for the purpose being very closely woven—20,000 meshes to the square inch. Having secured a number of specimens we now proceed to inspect them under the microscope, and what strikes one immediately is their remarkable structure. The minute creatures have the strangest shapes imaginable, while their movements are weird in the extreme. The little animals which compose Plankton vary in size from a thousandth to a four of a inch in length. The specimens shown include Infusoria, Pagures, Copedoes, Porcellan Crabs, Maia Crabs, Ctenophores, star-fish and the obelia jelly-fish.

AISSA'S DREAM (2 parts—Sept. 27).—Aissa is the beloved wife of a famous lion tamer, and they live together very happily with their little daughter, Firuli. A terrible incident occurs which breaks up the happy family. One night during the performance the husband is mortally injured by the lions. To his deathbed the tamer calls his wife and she promises to always cherish his memory by not re-marrying and to dedicate her life to their little child.

The widow decides to leave for America with her daughter. During the voyage on board the ship Firuli, who is playing with her doll, accidentally drops it and the Count Boris picks it up. Through this Aissa becomes acquainted with him and very soon they are the best of friends. It is with much regret they part at the end of the voyage for the count now loves her deeply.

Shortly after her arrival she receives a visit from a manager offering her a good contract and while considering she is handed a note. It is from the count expressing his love for her and inviting her to a ball that evening. This influences her to refuse the offer made by the manager.

Aissa, her mind now occupied with new and pleasant thoughts, pays little attention to Firuli. She leaves the child crying and attends the ball, where she receives flattering attention. Smilingly she listens to the proposal of the count, and when he leaves her in a little side reception room to wait for him while he bids farewell to his guests, Aissa, very much exhausted, falls asleep.

What dreams she has! The lions having burst open their cage and wild with their freedom have rushed into the room where her little daughter is sleeping alone. They jump across the bed smothering her child, and then from his picture hanging on the wall her dead husband steps out returned to life and madly wrestles with the infuriated lions. With a yell Aissa awakens and freeing herself from the arms of the count, who has returned at her scream, she rushes home to find her beloved child quietly and happily sleeping in her bed. Taking her in her arms she fervently vows never again to leave her.

THE WILD GUARDIAN (2 parts—Oct 4).—It was the custom of the old noble families to keep some symbol that represented their name and which was handed down from generation to generation. The family of the Prince Lionello kept in the park of their castle a living lion which symbolized the strength and generosity of the Lionello race. Daily the old prince pays a visit to the lion Sultan, and his only daughter, Tecla, also learns to love the beast.

One day the old prince forebodes that his death was near and on his visit to the lion he entreats him to guard the family honor. Returning to his room he makes out his will, appointing as his sole heir his nephew, Charles, who was then in America making his fortune, provided he would marry Tecla.

The young girl, unknown to her father, loves Robert, a lieutenant in the Navy. Her father's wishes regarding her marriage to her cousin whom she does not know makes her very unhappy, but in order not to distress the old prince she promises to obey him.

The Prince Lionello dies, and Charles, the nephew, receiving the news, leaves the wild plains of the West to return to the old country as his uncle's heir. After the voyage by ship he is traveling on a train occupying a compartment together with other travels the adventurer, Martin Perez, and being very tired Charles falls asleep. Perez soon leaves the train and the porter in a great hurry takes by mistake the bag belonging to Charles. Unfortunately a terrible disaster shortly after occurs in which Charles loses his life.

The next morning in his hotel Martin Perez reads in the newspapers an account of the wreck and sees his name among the list of the dead as his bag had been found near the body of Charles. The adventurer decides to take advantage of the situation, thinking that as Charles had been taken for him he would assume Charles place. Opening the valise and examining the contents he learns the reason for Charles' return and determines to go to the castle as the prince's nephew.

Perez is received with due pomp and becomes an inmate of the castle. He is shown around the grounds and at the sight of the lion recoils. The old lion Sultan seeing the stranger, takes a great dislike to him and is thrown into an uncontrollable rage.

The wedding day at length arrives and Perez shortly before the marriage hour goes to the chamber in which were kept the documents identifying him. Not in vain were the old prince's last words to the lion, for somehow knowing what was taking place, he bursts through his cage and rushes into the room. The wild beast and the man are alone together. By some miraculous power the imposter is able to leave the room without falling into the jaws of the hungry and infuriated lion. The terror with which he is possessed almost maddens him, and the adventurer confesses the truth to his astounded listeners.

Martin Perez is chased from the castle, and thus through the old lion Sultan, the family honor is retained and Robert, who has come to bid a last farewell to his sweetheart, is married to Tecla instead.

THE MESSAGE OF THE SEA (Feature Release—3 parts).—Fifteen years before his death, William van Heem, a rich Dutchman, misjudged his wife, and to punish her he took their baby girl into the garden and left her under a tree. Remorse for his act haunted the last days of his life, and towards its close he saw the scene re-enacted in a vision. In his will he endeavored to atone for his deed. Francis Bassnell, his steward, and Jacob Teylin, his valet, had served him well and to them he left $15,000 each, the remainder of his fortune—after making a handsome provision to his solicitor to endeavor to find the girl—being bequeathed to the daughter. If her existence could not be proved at the end of five years, the remainder of the money, amounting to the large sum of $400,000, was to be divided between the steward and valet. Such a large sum tempted the two men into evil courses, and they, as well as Mr. Herbert, the solicitor, sought for the girl.

Katie, the abandoned child, had been found by the landlady of the White Rose Inn, at Weningham, and at the time the story opens was twenty years of age. A winsome, attractive girl, Katie was not only beloved by her foster-mother and by Grace, the young daughter of the landlady, but by Frank, a fisherman. His love was reciprocated and they were looking forward to an early wedding. Frank's father, however, disapproved of the match, but Frank resolved that, whether his father agreed or not, Katie should be his wife.

Search for the girl was made simultaneously by the solicitor and the unfaithful servants, who learned that the girl known as Katie, whom the landlady of the White Rose Inn had brought up as her daughter, was found by her, fifteen years previously. The servants came to the inn to make a stay and to see if it were possible to abduct the girl. It did not appear to them to present any particular difficulty, and a tower on the seashore a few miles distant, offered a safe retreat until they could decide where to keep her until they had secured the money. When their plans had matured they notified the landlady that the following morning they would leave. Katie assisted them to take their baggage to the waiting motor-car and, the way being clear, when she stepped into the car with a valise they forcibly detained her, stifled her cries and drove away to the tower.

Little Grace had seen Katie get into the car and was suspicious of the occurrence, believing that she was forcibly detained. When later in the morning Frank called to say good-bye to his sweetheart, he heard the story Grace had to tell, but declined to credit it, preferring to believe that Katie had been enticed away. He was so deeply in love that the desertion of his sweetheart, as he believed it to be, cut him up badly, and when his vessel had got to sea, he deliberately jumped overboard. To his regret he was rescued.

In solitary confinement in the tower, Katie schemed to escape. There was no possibility of opening the door: her captors had seen to that. Iron bars prevented escape through the window unless assistance was at hand. The girl was plucky and full of resource. An empty bottle, in which the man had left wine with her food, gave her an idea. In blood, drawn from her wrist, she wrote on a piece of linen torn from the bed sheet: "Help, I am a prisoner on the island! Come at low tide." This message she placed in the bottle and, smashing the window, dropped it into the water. Hoping that her message would be found, she loosened the bars at the window and waited hopefully. Sad and lonely, without her sister, Grace took her sailing boat to the beach. The outgoing tide was bearing a bottle to sea, and Grace waded after it. To her had fallen the opportunity of reading the despairing message from the imprisoned Katie. The message of the sea had come to Grace, and she seized the opportunity. The girl set sail for the tower, and watching from the window Katie saw the boat come ashore, and the little navigator run across the sands intent on her rescue. The loosened bars at the window were torn away and the bed sheet, already in strips and knotted, passed down to the waiting girl below. Katie reached the beach safely, and was soon aboard the boat making for home.

Too late, Bassnell and Teylin drove up in the car. The broken window and knotted sheet were evidence of the way their rich prize had escaped. Making for Weningham was a sailing boat, and they realized that they must reach the landing place before the arrival of the boat. But fate intervened. Throwing caution to the winds, they endeavored to pass over the railroad before an express. The attempt was a belated one, and while Katie and Grace were landing, the engine of the train dashed into the car and abruptly terminated the career of a precious pair of scoundrels. Frank's attempt at suicide had left him weak, and it was at home that he heard the story of the rescue from Grace. Delighted beyond measure at her achievement, Grace told how she had rescued her foster sister. Frank saw that he had done his sweetheart an injustice in mistrusting her and took her to his arms. Even then the reason for the abduction was not clear, and not until the arrival of Mr. Herbert, who followed closely on their heels, was the mystery explained. Katie was entitled to $400,000, and a fair future was before the reunited lovers.

This Trade Mark The Guarantee of Excellence on Goods Electrical.

Better Light for Your Machine

The first requirement of good projection is a powerful steady light.

An arc lamp using direct current from a G-E Rectifier gives the finest light that can be obtained. The light is powerful and does not flicker like the light of an alternating current arc.

The G-E Rectifier not only improves the quality of the light, but at the same time it reduces the cost for current, because the rectifier furnishes current at the exact voltage needed by the lamp. Losses in rheostats are therefore entirely eliminated.

Sargent's Photoplay Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

WHAT CAUSES PEOPLE

To continually patronize one PICTURE THEATRE in preference to another ?

Of course, location and films have something to do with it, but QUALITY of the picture is what builds up a steady patronage, that makes the business profitable.

This depends on your MACHINE and if you are using any other but--

The Approved Motiograph

YOU ARE NOT GETTING THE BEST RESULTS

With our Machine you can project a clear, sharp picture, and won't worry your patrons by continuous flickering pictures. BUT this is not all. You should know about our guarantee and other points of merit, which is given in our free booklet. WRITE TODAY FOR IT.

Another Pleasing Surprise for the New England Exhibitors

IN addition to our contracts already signed for New England on all of the FAMOUS PLAYERS FEATURE PRODUCTIONS, we have closed contracts with the ALL STAR FILM CORPORATION for New England on all of their productions this season.

First release, "Arizona," Sept. 15th. Produced by Augustus Thomas. Is this not a wonderful combination?

Mrs. Fiske in "Tess d'Urbervilles" and Mary Pickford in the "Bishop's Carriage" have already made a wonderful success, just as we said they would.

The FAMOUS PLAYERS and ALL STAR Circuit of Theatres are forming fast. Below is a list of theatres that have signed exclusive contracts for their city or town.

Remember, when you make that "Clean-Up" with "SAPHO" from the State-Rights Man, that NEW MAJESTIC PRODUCED IT!

"Sapho" with all its great money-making possibilities is—simply a GOOD Majestic picture. "Sapho" with all its six sumptuous reels is—simply a GOOD Majestic picture. "SAPHO" with all its Florence Roberts glory and that of a prominent supporting cast is—simply a GOOD Majestic picture. And there are lots of good Majestic pictures. They haven't all some world-famous legitimate star, nor thousands on thousands of feet to tell their story, or even immense theatres particularly to "show" in, but they are

THE PERFECT PROJECTION AND DURABILITY OF

POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH NO. 6A

Built to stand hard wear and giving perfect projection, it is the machine that renders perfect satisfaction throughout the world.

THIS LETTER, FROM A PRACTICAL MAN, SPEAKS FOR ITSELF:—

Columbia, S. C., Aug. 15, 1913.

Nicholas Power Co.,
New York City.

Dear Sirs—Wish you would advise me if your Automatic Loop Setting Device can be attached to an ordinary No. 6, and if so, what is the price of same, as we want to purchase two of them for the machines we are now using, which, of course, are POWERS—the best machine built to-day for the man who wants perfect projection and at the same time a machine that will LAST. I ran the first No. 6 that was installed in this state and have been running a No. 6 ever since, and must say that we do get some clear picture with a RADIUM screen and POWERS Machines.

I have always been a staunch admirer of Powers machines, and always will be. This theatre is going to enlarge; we have not got the room, and we have built up a fine and increasing business, and I don't think we did it with anything but good pictures; we are using Mutual Service; my machines grind steady from 11 A. M. to 11 P. M. (THEY MUST BE GOOD ONES TO STAND THIS GRIND.)

Please let me hear from you at once about this.

I am, truly yours,

Pastime. (Signed) M. Meriwether, Electrician.

Watch It Grow!

That brand new comedy brand of film on that Universal program is going to make a big hit from the very start. It is the kind of stuff you've been demanding—the kind that keeps your patrons in an uproar from the first scene to the last. Now remember:—There will be two "JOKER" comedies every week, Wednesday and Saturday. The first one comes on Saturday, Oct. 25th, in place of the Saturday split "Imp," which will be discontinued. The other takes the place of our Wednesday "Powers" release, which is to be moved up to Monday.

PLEASE NOTIFY YOUR EXCHANGE RIGHT NOW THAT YOU WANT TWO "JOKER" COMEDIES EVERY WEEK AS QUICKLY AS YOUR EXCHANGE CAN ARRANGE IT.

Hollywood, Cal., Sept. 5, 1913.

To the photoplay going public:

I cannot but be conscious that, as the winner of one and the third in another recent Popularity Contest, I evidently possess a warm place in the heart of the public and I am touched and gratified.

In order that I may merit this esteem, I have joined the Universal forces at Hollywood, Cal., where the facilities are so wonderful and the acting support so adequate that I feel I must do even better work than in the past.

To my friends and well wishers I extend hearty Universal greetings.

"The Bridge of Shadows"

Selig. Two reels.
Released Oct. 13.

A powerful drama of circumstantial evidence. A bank bookkeeper is instructed by the president to return to work in the evening. He goes, and is arrested as a burglar. Though later acquitted, the stigma of police suspicion follows him till his innocence is undeniably proven.

The constant appeal of General Film Service is that it is as broad as humanity. It never gets into a rut and never harps on one kind of picture. Every week there is a variety that is as wide as an audience's emotions. The most intelligent man, the most romantic girl, the most hilarious young-

"The Last Minute"

Kleine-Cines. Two reels
Released Oct. 14.

Here's another of the "Arizona Bill" series, featuring Joe Hamman. On horseback he chases the bandits, who leap on a passing train, jumps from his horse to the vestibule, carries the fight over the tops of coaches and finally dives from the locomotive into a river bed. Can you beat it?

"The Vampire"

Kalem. Two reels.
Released Oct. 15.

This powerful drama features Bert French and Alice Eis in their world-famous "Vampire Dance," which has carried their fame around the world. The story hinges on the redemption of a country boy, an artist, who has fallen among evil companions, and is an outcast. The dance itself will fascinate your houses.

"The Taking of Rattlesnake Bill"

Lubin. Two reels.
Released Oct. 16.

The regeneration of a bad man. When the sheriff's little child's life is at stake, the bandit forgets himself. It is only when he is sure that there is no longer any danger for the little one that he gives himself up for the law to take its course. Gripping heart-interest here.

ster, the most motherly woman —all of these find something in each program especially suited to their tastes. And the contrast is so cleverly devised that each one finds intense interest in every single picture as it appears. Here are this week's examples of what we mean. Book them.

"The Haunts of Fear"

Patheplay. Two reels.
Released Oct. 16.

This is another of the regular multiple feature service begun two weeks ago by Pathe. The excellent photography that runs throughout the picture makes the very most of the picturesque Western setting and the splendid interest of the plot. Don't miss these pictures.

200 Fifth Ave., New York

"The Foreman's Treachery"

Edison. Two reels.
Released Oct. 17.

Here is a great story of the Welsh mines. An old miser, his beautiful daughter, his half-witted son, a handsome young workman in a nearby copper mine, and the false foreman who impersonates a ghost—these are the characters that carry a story of intense interest from first to last.

"Broncho Billy Gets Square"

Essanay. Two reels.
Released Oct. 17.

Two outlaws, brothers-in-arms, are wanted by the law. Jealousy leads one of them to give up the other. Broncho Billy is the one sent to jail. He serves his fifteen-year term, and comes out to get square. He finds his false friend, a prosperous gambler now, in time to prevent a bigamous marriage.

"The Pirates"

Vitagraph. Two reels.
Released Oct. 18.

The board of directors of a biscuit company have themselves kidnapped for the advertising that will result. A young sloop captain, fascinated by the daughter of one director, accomplishes the job. A fight on the yacht, a chase by a revenue cutter, a suddenly enveloping fog —and John Bunny in the midst of it all. Whew! What action!

Victims of Circumstance

A melodrama that moves from the place of business to the elegance of the boudoir, and then by caprice of fate forces the victims of circumstantial evidence to become wanderers on the dark side of a great city, shunned by their former familiars and persecuted by the police—makes the changing fabric of this story vital, touching and fascinating.

"The Wheels of Justice"

IN TWO PARTS

For Release Tuesday, October 21, 1913

A genuinely engaging subject, unusual in conception and distinctly original in production. A charming story in which love, adventure, and daring play large parts.

George Townley, a rising young novelist, is thrown into the river after being shot by a jealous and unsuccessful author, who steals the script of George's new book. Miss Vincent's brother, Frank, hears that a new bridge which he has just erected has collapsed, killing several people. Fearing trouble, Frank is about to flee the country, when he is arrested for the murder of George.

How George was rescued from the river by peasants; the love of the peasant girl; how Gladys Vincent, at the point of self-inflicted death, was saved by a heroic and daring act on the part of the peasant girl; how the would-be murderer-novelist was caught by a chance line from the book he had stolen, while a guest at a dinner in his honor, all combines to make a tale much out of the ordinary.

The famous Cines Company never used better judgment in the selection of beautiful exteriors. The watcher is charmed with a succession of quaint and dainty vistas—and those remarkable feats of daring for which the house of Cines has ever been noted are much in evidence in "The Wheels of Justice." The above cut of the falling bridge fails to do this remarkable scene justice. Two men are seen to hurtle over the bridge into the waters beneath, a thrilling "touch" that stirs the sluggish blood and makes you wonder "how they did it."

Better book it. And remember the date is Tuesday, October 21. Released through General Film Company.

THE FOREMAN'S TREACHERY

In Two Reels Produced in Wales Released Friday, October 17th

The scenic grandeur of Wales with its rugged mountains and deep set lakes forms an ideal setting for this dramatic film. Griffith discovers rich ore on the mine property of which he is a foreman. Concealing his discovery, he tries to raise money to buy it from the discouraged owner. Old Lloyd, a miser, conceals his money in the ancient Abbey courtyard. Griffith, learning of it, follows him and kills him in a struggle on the brink of the old Abbey well. He places the tobacco pouch belonging to David, the lover of the miser's daughter, upon the scene of the struggle. David, discovering the foreman's secret ore bed, barely escapes the foreman and his confederates by a wild ride down the mountain in an ore car, only to be arrested for the murder of Lloyd. But the silent testimony of the miser's half-witted son convicts Griffith of the crime, and he is blown to atoms by a great blast while fleeing the wrath of David.

Facts and Comments

THE cheap wits of the daily press are convulsed with solitary laughter because Mr. Bryan, Secretary of State, has lectured at Chautauquas where moving pictures were shown. Much is said by somnolent editorial writers about the horrible hurt to dignity which is involved in such a proceeding, and we are told that the European press and the leaders of European diplomacy are very much put out about it. We cannot "work up" any sympathy for these poor domestic wits and the shocked diplomats of Europe. We think Mr. Bryan realizes that no man need suffer from any connection, direct or indirect, with motion pictures. It might prostrate the critics entirely to have Mr. Bryan lecture on motion pictures, but we feel quite certain that he would do so without hesitation if he found pictures which were useful to him in his lecture work.

Why should he not lecture even in a hall where motion pictures are shown? He is helping the work of education, and if he receives a compensation he has a perfect right to take it. Dignity is a thing of the mind and must be natural if it is to claim our respect. A man can maintain his true natural dignity in any surroundings. The other kind of dignity which depends on airs and clothes is generally but a form of stupidity. We have never been greatly impressed by artificial dignity of any kind, and the chances greatly favor our calmly surviving the horrors of the Parisian diplomats.

MEMBERS of the Board of Education in a neighboring county recently inquired of a man prominent in educational moving picture work what he thought of introducing kinematographic courses of instruction in the schools. The man called their attention to the articles in THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, and the members of the board concluded there was a lack of material. The fact is there is not at this writing a single definite course of kinematographic instruction which could either supply or even supplement the text books. The educational picture is an occasional picture, and is not the result of any systematic effort. The educational picture to be used either as an aid or a substitute for the text book must be made to order and must, of course, be intelligently and competently directed. With all the wealth piled up by our producers it is strange that no such systematic course of kinematographic instruction has been attempted. In Europe at least three great producers have an educational department attached to their plant, but we on this side have done little. Leaving Edison out, we have practically done nothing.

HOW long will the present unit of the moving picture entertainment be recognized? In other words, how long are we going to measure the motion picture entertainment by reels of a thousand feet? With the growth of the multiple-reel feature it is altogether probable that the unit will be increased to two thousand feet. The two thousand feet magazines now in use and growing in popularity promise to revolutionize present methods of presentation. A four-reel feature presented in two parts will seem much more acceptable than the four-reel division with its incident delays. The length of an act on the speaking stage is on an average half an hour. We are not, of course, speaking of vaudeville acts, which last but from ten to fifteen minutes.

It must be said that this innovation has some drawbacks which are worth considering. The great charm of the motion picture program consists in its variety. Therein lies one of its advantages over the speaking stage. We can have in one brief hour a little of the drama, a glimpse into foreign lands and a comedy. If the motion picture program must sacrifice its variety for the sake of the feature we may be paying an altogether too heavy price for it. It would be interesting to have the views of old experienced exhibitors on this subject: Does the feature interfere with the variety of the program? THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD would be glad to hear from its friends and readers in order that the question may be thoroughly canvassed and some good may come out of intelligent discussion.

THE daily press, in reporting a mine disaster, records the astonishing fact that one of the entombed miners is singing all day long. If this particular miner is a reformed "illustrated singer" in moving picture houses we have great hopes for his rescue. The firm earth will shrink away if he keeps on repeating his vocal repertory. There is nothing which the average illustrated song of today will not disintegrate if it gets half a chance.

The Bliss of Ignorance

By W. Stephen Bush

A WRITER in a monthly magazine, discussing the horribly bromidic subject, "The Menace of the Movies," lashes himself into a perfect frenzy in proving that twice two make four. Not satisfied with this splendid achievement in higher mathematics, he goes into a second seance to demonstrate that two subtracted from four leaves two.

The writer stands in need of some elemental information touching the subject of moving pictures and the speaking stage. He makes the fatal and shallow mistake of setting the silent stage against the speaking stage in everlasting and irreconcilable opposition. According to his theory, the silent stage must languish as the moving picture rises in the esteem of the public and vice versa. He does not realize that the motion picture is a new art in itself, with its own standards of ethics and its own standards of art. The technique of the motion picture and of the conventional speaking stage differ widely. The speaking stage has this one priceless advantage over the silent stage, i. e., the human voice. The silent stage has the advantage of realism. It is not confined to the drama—it takes in all forms of plastic art and every division of literature; the novel and the epic are as much at home on the screen as the purely dramatic. Does it require the possession of extraordinary mental gifts to grasp the fact that the two stages, the silent and the speaking, may both be developed to their highest possibilities without one hindering the other in the slightest degree? The writer whom we have quoted breaks out into this prophetic wail: "We are entering the last phase of mechanical civilization." He says this in connection with his criticism of motion pictures, implying that kinematography is a purely mechanical contrivance. Many others who persevere in ignorance through carelessness have the same strange notion.

In the Church of St. Peter in Chains in Rome stands the immortal statue of Moses, made by Michelangelo Buonarotti. In New York are several copies of this statue reproduced by purely mechanical means. Does anyone want to conclude from this that sculpture is a "phase of mechanical civilization"? We will readily admit that at the present moment the moving picture art is scarcely out of the hands of the midwife. With the exception of less than a dozen great features, art in moving pictures is at the present time to be found only in the form of faint traces, like certain mineral matter which may be found in microscopic quantities even in ordinary drinking water.

It was much the same with every art, and it is very much so with a new, modern art. The development is slow. The weeds of commercialism, stronger in our age than in any which has preceded it, choke the flower of art. Here is a difficulty with which the ancient arts never had to contend. When I think of certain studios which I have seen and certain producers whom I have known and both of which still exist with all the hardihood of rankest weeds, I have to regulate my laughing machinery and put on the brakes, lest the hugeness of the joke overcome me altogether and cause severe shortness of breath. There is no art, nor the shadow of art, nor even an attempt at art. Would I be justified in drawing inferences against the artistic possibilities of the kinematograph? It took centuries to develop sculpture and more centuries to develop painting. The motion picture is as young as the day at sunrise. We must be patient, but we may be very sure right now that the roots of an art are here. None of us has fathomed, none of us is likely to fathom, the mysterious processes of nature, but in a general way we know that the seeds must be cast into congenial soil and that time must pass before the harvest can be reaped. The Michelangelo and the Tintoretto of the moving picture will come just as soon as the shadows lengthen at the parting of the sun.

When the moving picture passes into this stage of perfection the artists directing its destinies will combine the eye of the painter and the sculptor with the eye of the dramatist. We may not—we most probably will not—live to see those days, but they will come.

Coming back to the writer in the magazine, we note that he ridicules the possibility of supplanting the drama and the opera with talking and singing pictures. The good man is fighting windmills like the Knight of the Sorrowful Figure—there is no such possibility; and no person in perfect and orderly control of his mental faculties has ever claimed such a possibility. Those who have hoped to make a reality out of a shadow plus an echo are doomed to disappointment. They are hardy optimists. I remember when the delusion first started and when fabulous sums of money were asked for the exclusive privilege of the "cameraphone" in cities like New York and Philadelphia.

The very basis of the silent drama is the exclusion of the voice. It must be erected on that basis and it cannot be erected on any other. It is not pantomime. The latter is an old and conventional form of drama by gestures, and is held fast in rules that apply like clamps of iron. It is wholly devoid of all initiative and freedom, and is as incapable of free growth and development as a plant in a small flower-pot. The motion picture drama is fettered by no such unbreakable shackles. Its possibilities are as free of limit and restriction as the moves in a game of chess. The powers of expression minus the voice are infinite in their variety, and the silent drama is daily improving these opportunities. We have in a few years advanced from the fifty feet lengths showing animals in motion to reproducing the classic dramas and epics of the world's literature. The screen, however, is not for adaptations alone. The original screen drama written for the screen and for screen actors is knocking at the door. This drama is capable of a development of which few of us have a just conception.

Our friend says in his magazine article: "Obviously there can be but slight intellectual appeal without words." Now, the pure intellectual appeal is not and never has been and never can be sought by any stage, whether the silent or the speaking stage. Only metaphysics addresses itself to the intellect alone. On the stage the appeal is primarily to the emotions. Emotions are stirred fully as much by actions as by words. We often say that our feelings are too deep for words. There are ways of expressing the deepest emotions without a word. Literature and history are full of such examples. When Marc Antony sought to stir up the mob of Rome he drew the shroud from Caesar's body, and this simple act more than all his words accomplished his purpose. The secret signals of the soul are not always put in words.

We are sorry for any man of intelligence who at this day still writes about the "menace of the moving pictures." The menace lies only in the abuse of the pictures, and there is less of that today than ever before, and there will be still less of it as we march forward on the road of progress.

Red-Light Films

By Louis Reeves Harrison

THE photoplay comes close to being a criticism of life when it deals with a modern subject, and this is even true of those robed in classic setting. There is no need of avoiding the truth in some of its repulsive aspects when it must be held up as a torch of enlightenment, but this does not mean that we are justified in opening sewers of filth on the screen for the purpose of drawing the froth and scum of humanity into the picture shows, especially at a time when nearly every live community in this country is trying to solve the problem of human decadence.

Each author who writes a story for the screen, and each producer of such story, publishes his estimate of public taste. He advertises his high or low estimate of his fellow creatures in what he sets forth. If he knows anything about that public, if he has made an intelligent study of people who go to the picture shows, he must know that it is composed of individuals having widely divergent likes and dislikes in the subject matter alone, to say nothing of the form and treatment of an idea. It is on this account that variety of program is required, but sound common sense should indicate that no part of that varied program should be violently offensive to the best patrons of the place.

Price and convenience of hour eminently qualify the picture exhibitions for "family" entertainment, and nearly all such places are largely frequented by women and children. The screen portrayals correspond in one way to the public library and in another to the delightful periodicals that penetrate homes in every part of our progressive country. It is not in the nature of any man who respects others of his own blood and nationality to put into circulation what can have no claim to sincerity except its morbid nastiness. That it is being done is to be regretted for more than good business reasons.

The biggest producers in this country are those who are putting out clean photoplays. Whatever their estimate of the general public at the outset, they have learned by experience that an appeal to the whole people does not mean an emasculated and debauching presentation of what is repulsive to decent people. If there is a delicate subject involved and one likely to be of interest to mature minds, such as many of the difficult sex questions, the treatment is correspondingly delicate. There is where ability to frame and handle the photodrama comes in.

There is another good business reason for raising rather than lowering the present quality of releases, and that is one affecting all interests involved. The popularity of moving pcitures, won on novelty and low price of admission to the little theaters, is leading straight to productions which seem destined to rival those of the stage and creative efforts in literature, even to an interweaving of the arts, and the best of them are responsible for a constant improvement in public taste. Exhibits that are demoralizing, or degenerating, act, therefore, to the detriment of all now being done to hold the respect and confidence already enlisted. Every photoplay of low motive, or of nauseating treatment, operates as a drag anchor on the progress of the art.

This business has its enemies, people antagonized by one or another sickening screen spectacle, and harsh judgments of what is being exhibited are causing harsh measures to be taken against the abused freedom of the screen. The whole business is being severely criticised in some quarters because of its worst elements, the weaklings of screen production despised by strong men and offensive to sane women, and if unjust restrictions are eventually imposed upon exhibitors it will be largely on account of unintelligent demand from them and from the exchanges.

From what source does the demand for "rotten realism" come? Does it come from the millions sincerely entertaining one or another form of religious belief? Does it come from the struggling millions who are trying to build up some equitable form of government? Does it come from the millions of earnest fathers and devoted mothers trying to do the best they can for their children? Does it come from men having sisters or daughters of clean minds? Does it come from women who believe in manly men? Does it come from those who cherish home and family life?

Does not the demand for rotten realism in the drama come from those of inferior starting point and faulty education who liken the whole world to themselves?

Read the leading magazines, those circulating among tens of millions of American people, and note that the drift in all is towards building the home and family. Does that indicate what the people want? There are a large number of imperfect minds throughout the country, and the defects in most of them are entirely curable. A tremendous effort is being made to cure them, to give every human being a square deal. Is it possible that those engaged in building up character among their fellow creatures are demanding screen pictures that gloat over the prurient?

We may tolerate what is loathsome in a monkey, but we try to keep what is nauseating about the human monkey out of sight until it can be cured. To exhibit it on the screen is to stimulate forms of mental disease that lead to decadence rather than to progress. To portray the nastiness of human nature is to excite it among those inclined to vicious habits, who are really sick physically, mentally and morally and in need of treatment—is simply destructive of what intelligent men and women are trying to build up.

We are reaching out for a better human race and superior living conditions for those who get little happiness out of life. And if that is what the people want, if we are trying to improve on our error-laden political and social condition, the screen may easily become a tremendous factor in cheering, inspiring and stimulating us in the struggle. Should it be that, or should it be permitted to hold up before untrained minds all that is ugly and revolting, obviously for a profit, under a farcical pretense of teaching decency by exhibiting indecency?

It takes courage to stand for a principle, especially where one's pocket is involved, when the question of self-maintenance is concerned, but if men of the press band together for clean pictures, as they are already inclined to do, and if they can put a little backbone into our Board of Censors, the elimination of Calibans and Cretins in the moving picture business can be accomplished without segregating them and preventing procreation of their kind.

Red-light films are not designed to increase human efficiency. They are a cinder in the clear vision of those who are looking forward to greater beauty and charm in the art. They are offensive to sane and sound Americans. They repel rather than attract those who believe in home and family life. They lessen respect for moving pictures wherever exhibited. They strike at the heart of what is best in our women and children. They stand for nothing but the gratification of perverted desire. Cut them out.

"The Making of a Woman"

(American).

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

"THE Making of a Woman" is a pleasing one-reel subject by the American's second company, under the direction of Thomas Ricketts. Special attention is drawn to the fine photography in this film. The effects are soft, the definition clear, and the half tones are well brought out.

Miss Winifred Greenwood and Ed. Coxen are cast in the leading roles, and again command high consideration for intelligent acting. Miss Greenwood is strikingly attractive as Gladys, a city belle who has become the wife of a sturdy rancher. In the several scenes showing the rifts in the early married life of Gladys and her husband, Miss Greenwood is careful not to assume the role of a termagant, but rather to appear as the pampered city beauty, who has not yet succeeded in resigning herself to rustic manners and to her country husband's control, even though she does love him. The thought suggests itself to one that Jim Blake, the husband, must have grown more deeply infatuated with his wife with each recurring family spat, for her transient bursts of temper are reflected only in indignant, flashing eyes, while the beauty of her face is rather heightened than marred. The incident that leads Gladys to find her true self is quite exciting and it teaches a lesson that will appeal to all.

Scene from "The Making of a Woman" (American).

Scene from "The Making of a Woman" (American).

Mr. Coxen's Jim Blake is a virile characterization. The scene in a western country dance hall has got the atmosphere to a dot. The outlaw, Red Dolan, finds an able double in George Field.

Like many another good man before his time, Jim Blake, a prosperous ranchman is smitten with the charms of a city maiden, Gladys by name. He is a strapping, good-looking young fellow and sees in every woman a being that is just slightly lower than an angel. He is awakened from his dream soon after the honeymoon trip, when Gladys indulges in frequent fits of petulance, on account of the lack of harmony in the surroundings of her country home.

Seeking to relieve the monotony of this home life, Jim arranges to take his wife to a country dance nearby. It is his wish that they should ride to the dance, and he is much surprised as well as shocked to find that his wife expects to ride on horseback, in evening dress. He orders the horses to the stable and he and his wife drive to the dance hall, she being in any other than an amiable mood.

Gladys takes no pains to hide her disdain for the cowgirls present, and mortifies her husband by refusing to greet with handshake those to whom he introduces her. He notices, however, that she engages in conversation with one of the musicians present, without introduction, and in a towering rage he orders the fellow about his business and then takes his wife in hand. She gives him tit for tat and, when he leaves her for a moment or two, she steals out of the room and starts for home afoot. She gets lost in the mountains and is discovered by Red Dolan, an outlaw.

The only child of the lawbreaker lies ill in a little hut hidden among the hills and he forces Gladys to accompany him to nurse the boy back to health. Gladys, however, refuses and he casts her out into the night with maledictions. Once more the terrified woman tries to find the road homewards, and her terror is increased by the unearthly howls of a band of coyotes. She rushes back to the hut and entreats the outlaw to take her in; but he refuses. Again she begs, this time explaining that she will do what she can to save his child's life, and Red Dolan admits her.

The boy on the pallet, in the delirium of fever, cries out the word "mother," and this strikes a chord in the woman's heart that has never before been touched. A great wave of sympathy carries her to the bedside, where she kneels and takes the child in her arms and ministers to his wants throughout the night. In the morning the fever has abated and the battle for life is won.

Jim Blake and his cowboy neighbors have been scouring the hills all night in search of his wife. When he discovers her, she is tending to the sick boy outside the door of the Dolan hut. She rushes into his arms and explains that she now understands what her life lacked.

The release date has been set for October 18.

ANNA LAUGHLIN JOINS RELIANCE.

A release that is sure to be viewed with interest by theater-goers all over the United States and Canada will be presented by the Reliance Company on October 11th, under the title of "The Rebellious Pupil." It will mark the appearance of the popular little stage favorite, Anna Laughlin, as a moving picture star. This clever little actress recalls "The Wizard of Oz," "The Top of the World," and numerous other well known productions in which she won her way into the hearts of the great theater going public. As "The Rebellious Pupil," she is said to be perfectly cast and seems as much at home before the camera as she was back of the footlights. At an early date Miss Laughlin will be presented by the Reliance as co-star with Charles Dickson in "The Flirt," a new comedy by Will Hough, author of "A Stubborn Cinderella."

UNIVERSAL PURCHASES SEVERAL EXCHANGES.

On September 15, the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, of New York, acquired all the right, title and interest of the United Motion Picture Company, at Oklahoma City, Okla.; the Riteservice Film Exchange, at Wichita, Kansas; the Progressive Film Exchange, at Fort Smith, Arkansas, and the United Motion Picture Company, at Amarillo, Texas. These offices are now under the general management of Mr. A. F. Beck, in addition to St. Louis and Kansas City. The names of the offices have been changed to Universal Film & Supply Company.

WILFRID NORTH OUT OF DANGER.

The Vitagraph director, Mr. Wilfrid North, who was seriously injured by the premature explosion of a yacht-cannon, was reported as losing his eyesight. He is now said to be very much better, and his eyesight has been saved. It is expected that he will be at work again in the studios about the 15th of October. He was engaged in directing a two-reel picture entitled, "Miss Tomboy," at the time of the accident.

"Last Days of Pompeii"

Eight-Reel Pasquali Feature.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THE story of Bulwer Lytton, from which this photodrama was adapted, is admirably suited to the purpose for various reasons, chief among which is the presence of a sympathetic character, the blind girl Nydia, throughout the action. This character was created by the author after a casual conversation in Naples, in which reference was made to the utter darkness that accompanied the first recorded eruption of Vesuvius. It was a condition in which the blind would be most favored from their ability to find their way to deliverance through the guidance of other senses. To her affliction is added an intolerable condition of slavery and an unrequited love for Glaucus, the young and noble Greek who rescued her from persecution.

Scene from "Last Days of Pompeii" (Pasquali).

Glaucus loves sweet Ione and gives her his blind slave Nydia, and it thus happens that the latter is compelled to hear the man she adores make love to another woman. The whole story of Nydia is one to arouse pity, and a central character that enlists such a feeling constitutes a powerful attraction in a photoplay. There is also high tension created when Glaucus is falsely accused of murder and condemned to ignominious death in an arena before thousands of Pompeians, while those who know the truth are imprisoned by his rival and accuser, the real murderer. The latter sits gloating over the prospect of seeing the man beloved by Ione torn to pieces, and the lions enter and approach the victim, before there is sign of relief.

Scene from "Last Days of Pompeii" (Pasquali).

The story is suited to photodramatic purpose for still another reason, that of presenting a grand spectacle of destruction of a city at its eminence of voluptuous luxury, of debauchery and decadence. The materials are ample and the Pasquali feature makes good use of them as a rule. Some of the scenes exhibit high artistic taste and knowledge of picture values that are very pleasing to the eye. The catastrophe is fairly effective—it is well nigh impossible to inspire dread in the moving picture audience after all it has passed through—but it would have been more realistic if actual views of the volcano had been added at certain moments instead of a studio eruption.

There is no attempt to give this feature an added educational value by indicating the relation of Pompeii and Vesuvius and by actual photographs of interesting remains. There is decided inspiration to fancy in semi-historical pictures if deft touches of reality are occasionally visible. While reading the screen story, just as in reading the book, it would not be out of place to visit the disinterred ruins of the ancient city, to view the houses, streets, temples and theaters of the proudest age of the Roman Empire that still remain fresh and vivid in graceful ruins. It would have helped to give us a genuine picture of Vesuvius still breathing forth smoke.

Bulwer Lytton undoubtedly took great pains in writing his novel, but he had to imagine the catastrophe just as he had to delineate feeling and depict character from his individual point of view. He probably did not err in his presentation of human passion and weakness, but the fact that there is no possibility of treating accurately a period so distant and unfamiliar deprives the novel itself of historical value, hence it would have been possible to improve on his version with views of what has been brought to light in the "City of the Dead" since his novel was written some ninety years ago. Aside from its lack of realism the Pasquali feature has a disadvantage from my point of view of being too long. It may not prove so with the general public.

GERTRUDE COGHLAN WITH SELIG CO.

The distinguished emotional actress Gertrude Coghlan has commenced work at the Selig Polyscope plant, in Chicago, under the direction of Producer Oscar Eagle in a most pretentious pictorial revival of her father's play (the late Charles Coghlan), "The Royal Box." Chris Lane's pictorial arrangement of this play makes it for 138 scenes, and Producer Eagle will probably augment this number.

"The Fruits of Vengeance"

Sensational Vitagraph Feature.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THIS photoplay is sub-titled "A Tragedy In Mid-Air" for bill poster purposes, but the motive is the same as in "The Vengeance of Durand" by Rex Beach, and both set forth the futility of man's attempts to usurp the office of retributive justice. The Scriptures have warned us. "Vengeance is mine," saith the Lord. "I will repay." The idea of wrathful retribution, whether just or excessive, has long been smouldering in the secret recesses of man's soul—the idea of getting even is one of the most persistent of primitive passions—but this screen story points a moral that will require a lot more pointing, that we might as well not interfere with the natural working out of a man's natural destiny when he is disposed to seriously injure his fellow creatures. He will get his before his career is finished, and we may get some of the same kind if we attempt his punishment prematurely by some private scheme of retaliation.

Scene from "The Fruits of Vengeance" (Vitagraph).

Scene from "The Fruits of Vengeance" (Vitagraph).

The simple truth presented in this picture is that man is a combative animal and a predatory one. This is especially true where a woman is the prize coveted by two males. The lady in this case is an ex-circus rider by the name of Pauline, as impersonated by Julia Swayne Gordon of shapely form. She is married to a man of wealth, Harry Morey, and preserves a memory of a circus performer, Courtenay Foote, who in this case contributes his modest share to human evolution by walking a tight rope. This is about all that he does well, and there is nothing doing on the credit side of his ledger when he calls upon Pauline at a time when she begins to long for a little variety in life, such as is afforded by automobile tastes with a trolley-car income, the lot of the average circus performer.

The husband does not approve of the invader, and instead of carrying his wife away to Palm Beach for a season he bursts into all kinds of rage—there are fifty-seven varieties shown in this screen portrayal—and so outrages his wife's self-respect that she leaves him and goes back to the old life, taking her little girl along. On account of this act of folly on her part, her husband decides to devote the remainder of his existence to the business of retaliation. With the privileges his wealth and leisure afford for doing something worth while, he devotes his career to gratifying a bitter desire, sure indication of a perverted or decadent mind.

He goes forth completely disguised and reappears as the proprietor of a circus in order to effect a dramatic vengeance and he thus becomes the employer of his wife and her lover. He is not particularly subtle, else he could have driven them gradually into acute poverty, the worst punishment doled out to human beings of health and ambition. He bides his time until the rope walker is dazzling an audience—the audience is made up of exhibitors who visited the Vitagraph yard during the convention. The dirty work, that of cutting the rope, is discovered and some athletes climb up rope ladders to the swings to save the little girl on the rope-walker's shoulders, the daughter of the man who planned the dastardly deed.

The husband now realizes that his scheme may react and attempts to climb after the athletes, but his time has come. The men on the swings save the child through their daring and skill. For some reason or other they also save the family breaker as well. The husband, who felt himself to be a wronged man because of the loss of his wife and child, who attempted to destroy the enemy of his peace and happiness, falls to his death. It would have been a good plan to have him grapple with his wife's lover in mid-air and both fall on the fickle wife, the child being the only one worth saving.

"ONLY A MOVIE."

But one of George Kleine's "movies." The above photograph will give one an idea of how much equipment is necessary to project the big "Quo Vadis." The show is seen leaving the Salt Lake Theater, Salt Lake City, Utah, with manager Edmund Manley in charge and his two mechanicians, Paul B. Welch and Arthur Allison.

THANHOUSER MAKES "ROBIN HOOD."

Coming out in October, "Robin Hood," is a four-reel Thanhouser special that tells the story of the famous son of an English nobleman who, with others, was reduced to the position of a vassal. Lloyd F. Lonergan, who wrote the scenario, made the most of the climax of every scene, and there are many very thrilling ones. William Russell has the title role. Gerda Holmes appears as Maid Marian. A synopsis of the story will appear in the department of Stories of the Films.

"Protea"

Interesting and Unique Subject to be Released by Eclair—In Five Parts with Lots of Thrills.

UTILIZING the accomplishments of two notable picture artists, Mlle. Josette Andriot and M. Bataille, the Eclair company has produced a five part subject that will arouse considerable interest among picture theater audiences. "Protea" is the title given, the theatrical meaning of which is "tranformation," and it fits the subject perfectly, for throughout its interesting length are shown a succession of quick changes of costume and personality by the two characters named. It is to this feature of the picture that the interest is due.

The story which becomes the vehicle for the exhibition of protean art is very simple. Two nations are about to enter into a treaty and the third nation is anxious to learn the terms thereof. To secure the desired information a charming adventuress is engaged. She undertakes the task provided she can have the assistance of a certain man who is at the time serving a prison sentence. His release is ordered and the pair start on their task. From this point we are treated to a succession of changes of costume, rapid and startling, until one begins to wonder what can possibly be the next.

Scene from "Protea" (Eclair).

By means of disguises and impersonations wthout number, the two spies manage to enter the house of the ambassador who has the copy of the treaty for safe keeping and secure possession of the coveted document. But they are closely pursued by secret service sleuths and are captured in their own house. It is not for long, for as the sleuths are searching for the missing treaty the spies escape. The house is full of tricks and traps that outwit the secret service men, some of which are most ingenious.

Having eluded the detectives at the outset it remains for the spies to pass the frontier, which is closely guarded. At first Protea buys a small traveling circus and hopes to be able to escape from the country under that guise, but she is recognized by an inn keeper and the secret service men are again put on the trail. Escaping, Portea and her accomplice lead the detectives a merry chase in an automobile. When that conveyance gives out Protea takes a bicycle from a passing cyclist and continues her flight.

Clever sleuths succeed in cornering her with the only avenue of escape a rustic bridge over a stream. The span is about thirty feet in length and the banks are high, so the sleuths just burn the bridge and wait to see what Protea will do next. How she does it we will not attempt to explain, but presently she is seen to ride toward the bridge and then "leap the gap" in true dare devil style, describing a high arc and landing safely on the other side much to the discomfiture of the waiting sleuths. It is said that Mlle. Andriot spent six months in the hospital after this feat.

The remaining portion of the trip of the spies to the frontier is commonplace in comparison, but nevertheless exciting. They get through, though, and the precious document is handed to the commissioner of police in record time, much to his surprise and gratification, and, to show that he bears no ill-will against the minister of the rival nation he sends it back to him with the information that he has retained a photograph for future reference in case the original should again be lost.

This subject, of course, depends entirely upon photographic tricks, but they are so well done that one's admiration is at once aroused and interest is kept at so high a tension that the succession of incidents do not become tiresome. To this must be added consideration for the good photography and splendid settings. Altogether "Protea" looks like a winner.

INQUEST CLUB RESUMES.

First Session of the Season Held at Keen's Chop House—Large Attendance and Keen Interest.

The regular "bugs" of the motion picture business—the writers of photoplays banded together as the Inquest Club—held their first meeting of the season at Keen's Chop House in West Thirty-six Street, New York City, on Monday evening, September 29. About forty-five persons were present and partook of a small supper and passed the evening discussing a number of pictures seen by most of them earlier in the evening at the Savoy Theater, Thirty-fourth Street.

Epes Winthrop Sargent, who usually presides as "coroner" at these inquests, was in the chair on this occasion and stated the purposes of the organization, advising the novitiates that their presence and the fact that they were interested in trying to induce some unsuspecting scenario editor to buy their scenarios, was sufficient to constitute them members of the club, to which there were no initiation fee or dues required. It was expected, he continued, that they would take a genuine interest in the criticism of pictures and that no single one of them should expect to do all the talking.

For at least an hour and between mouthsfull of chicken sandwiches, Welsh rabbits, hat coffee and mugs of musty ale, the several "jurors" held a post mortem on the pictures they had seen—and it was some p. m., believe me. If, by chance, any author or maker of the pictures discussed and cussed had been within hearing, they would have then and there decided to seek some other form of amusement. But, out of the discussion the members of the club derived much pleasure and instruction and adjourned to meet again on Monday, October 13, at the same place.

Those present were: Dr. R. R. Reed, Morristown, N. J.; Julius Oscar, Howard McCauley, R. E. Hellawell, John W. Kellette, New Rochelle; Mark S. Reardon, E. Acker, John J. Seaton, Alec A. Kuby, Joseph F. Poland, Dr. E. Boudinot Stockton, Carl L. Gregory, Russell E. Smith and Homer Croy of the New York World; Percy Crosby, cartoonist; I. Strauss, F. G. Andrews, Washington, N. J.; George J. Schmidt, John B. Black, Bogota, N. J., Herbert Friedenwald, D. Hopley, R. C. Morris, Edmund S. Hersch, Edward J. Montagne, E. M. Wickes, of the Writers Magazine; Jacques Kopfstein, Benjamine Barondess, Jas. L. Hoff, E. W. Sargent, Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Tufts, Mr. and Mrs. H. F. Jackson, Miss Grace M. Lease, Miss Frances Beyers, Miss Rose Strauss, Miss Mabel Strauss, Miss Mabel Leonard, Miss Marie McManus, Mrs. F. Ford, Mrs. Mary Louise Farley.

COURTENAY FOOTE TAKING A REST.

Mr. Courtenay Foote has concluded his engagement with the Vitagraph Company of America, and will take a well-earned rest before renewing his activities on the screen. This talented artist's work in numerous Vitagraph pictures is well known to all lovers of the silent drama. His portrayal of Wolf Salzman in the Vitagraph special "Father and Son" (or the "Curse of the Golden Land"), has been proclaimed one of the finest characterizations seen upon the screen. Admirers of Mr. Foote's work may look forward to seeing him in the near future in a number of interesting psychological photoplays which have been written especially for him.

OHIO BOARD OF CENSORS AT WORK.

The members of the Ohio State Board of Censors are on the job. They decided to visit the different centers of the trade in that state and examine films at the offices of the exchanges rather than to require all films to be sent to Columbus as provided in the act. Exchanges have been instructed to co-operate with the board by the different manufacturers, and Mayor Baker, of Cleveland, has announced that he will close any picture theater which runs pictures without the state label after November 4.

It is said that there will be an attempt to raise a question as to the constitutionality of the act, by Cleveland exhibitors.

David Horsley Back in Universal

Takes Over William Horsley's Universal Stock, Which Gives Him Balance of Control Between Laemmle and Powers.

DAVID HORSLEY is again with the Universal Film Manufacturing Company. "With" the Universal means that not only has he purchased the holdings of William Horsley, a brother, but that the 500 shares of common stock are placed on the side and to the aid and comfort and advantage of Carl Laemmle, the president of the Universal; consequently, the holdings credited to the faction of P. A. Powers are reduced by just this amount. The transaction is said to be greater in importance than the number of shares named or the intrinsic value of them would at first sight indicate. The placing of these 500 shares on the side of Mr. Laemmle is said to give him the absolute control of the Universal Company, even should the courts later decide that the 1540 shares now in litigation and formerly belonging to David Horsley are the property of Mr. Powers. The margin may not be great, but it is understood to be quite satisfactory to the president of the Universal. Included in the sale of the stock by William to David Horsley is the title to the big glass-inclosed studio the former has just completed in Bayonne, N. J. The structure is of three floors. In the basement are perforating, developing, printing, drying and experimental rooms. On the ground floor are offices, dressing rooms, storage rooms for scenery, etc. On the upper floor is ample stage capacity. The value of this property is understood to be close to six figures. At the time of writing, so far as known, no definite decision had been reached as to the occupants of the big factory.

The determination of David Horsley to again become a Universal stockholder was reached last week and on the spur of the moment. It came as a dramatic climax to a controversy in which were engaged William Horsley and his counsel and P. A. Powers and his lawyers. David Horsley had been for several days trying to dissuade William from disposing of his Universal holdings to Mr. Powers on the terms then under consideration, claiming the result would be to the disadvantage of his brother. William inclined to the belief that the offer of Mr. Powers was the best he could get for his stock. According to one version of the stormy session, an intimation was made by one of the Powers adherents that lawsuits might not be remote in case William any longer delayed closing the deal.

"I will buy his right, title and interest in all his lawsuits, stocks and real estate, and will give him an indemnifying bond to pay all lawyers and losses," declared David Horsley.

"I will bet a thousand dollars to fifty you don't dare to buy it," Mr. Powers replied, pulling out a roll of bills, according to the story told the World man.

"I'll not only buy it, but I'll pay cash for it, not second mortgages, as you are proposing to do," David Horsley is said to have retorted.

Mr. Powers has been interested with William Horsley in the building of the studio and is said to have advanced toward its construction $19,500. It was David Horsley's contention that if the money was paid on account of the building it could not be charged against the stock, which had been in Mr. Powers' possession and which he is said to have tried to transfer on the books of the Universal Company. The officers of the Universal, it is alleged, declined to accept the transfer as valid, and said they would issue new stock only to the owner of record, William Horsley, or by his personal instruction. It is understood David Horsley now claims to have in his possession an affidavit made by Mr. Powers in a friendly suit that the $19,500 was advanced by him toward the construction of the studio and that therefore Mr. Powers is estopped from claiming the sum was to apply on the stock.

The papers in the deal between the brothers were signed on Monday morning, and it was shortly before noon that the transfer of the real estate was recorded in Hudson County. There was a sensational incident in Bayonne just about the hour the deed was recorded. The Horsleys were in the office of the lawyer of William when several men left an automobile just at the door and walked toward the office. The two brothers stepped out the back door, walked through the tall grass in the yard, climbed two fences and hurried for an electric car. Just missing one, they went to the railroad station and took a train for New York. Their suspicions as to the identity of the callers at the lawyer's office were correct. The men carried an injunction; it would have been too late to be effective, as events proved, but the brothers were taking no chances on delays.

As matters now stand, David Horsley and P. A. Powers are in a measure partners in business. They have been together on other deals in the last five years, and have been friends as well, but it seems an undeniable fact that the "shutters are up" between them. As regards the relations which Mr. Horsley has re-established with the Universal Company and as to what form his participation in the affairs of the corporation will take, nothing has as yet been decided. It is believed Mr. Horsley's return will be welcomed by Mr. Laemmle and his associates as it will be congenial to Mr. Horsley. The latter since his homecoming from his European vacation has been looking around for something to do. He has given much thought to exhibiting problems, and has carefully looked over the field, but he confessed to the writer only last week that it was hard to turn his back on the manufacturing end of the film business, with which he had been connected successively in the Centaur, the Nestor, the Sales Company and finally the Universal. He is a film technician. His trips abroad yielded him much valuable information as to the best European methods in studio practice. This knowledge with his manufacturing experience of five and a half years will, if he becomes actively associated with the Universal, be bound to result to the advantage of the company.

Mr. Laemmle is immensely pleased over the turn of affairs. He expressed himself as confident of the outcome of the litigation over the original David Horsley stock, which may be decided on November 20, when the case again comes before Justice Goff. The president of the Universal said to a World man on Wednesday that he welcomes Mr. Horsley back with the Universal company. It was not difficult to see that Mr. Laemmle construes the action of Mr. Horsley in returning to the company as a stockholder as in a measure a personal compliment to himself and also an expression of confidence in the company.

KINEMACOLOR TO BUILD EASTERN PLANT.

It Will Be in Lowville, N. Y., Convenient to Varied Scenery of Great Beauty.

William H. Hickey, general manager of the London Kinemacolor Company, has been elected vice-president of the Kinemacolor Company, of America. Mr. Hickey during the past two months has been quietly investigating the conditions for establishing a big eastern Kinamacolor studio and manufacturing plant. He has just returned to New York City after concluding negotiations along this line. He has signed contracts for establishing at Lowville, N. Y., a plant for the eastern business of the Kinemacolor Company of America. The plans call for an outlay of over a half million dollars. Following the custom of some of the big commercial manufacturers, the Kinemacolor Company intends to practically establish its own city, using Lowville as a basis. Plans have been completed and building operations already started for a magnificent glass covered studio, over 300 feet in length. This studio is to be built immediately back of what is now the Lowville Town Hall, a theater seating about 1,200 persons. A large section of the wall back of the stage has been removed to allow connection between the studio and the stage of the theater. Productions will be rehearsed on the stage of the theater, and then played on one of the five stages in the glass covered studio, or in the open air when the scenarios call for natural backgrounds.

Lowville is situated in a wonderfully picturesque spot in northern New York State, being a short distance from the St. Lawrence River, which will give the acting companies the benefit of the wonderful scenery, castles and water effects of this beautiful river. Special laboratories will be constructed, and experimental work in connection with the Kinemacolor process will be carried on there. Mr. Hickey has had the water analyzed and finds that it is particularly suitable for the Kinemacolor needs, especially in the sensitizing of the film. Some of the best technical men from the London Kinemacolor laboratories are on their way here now to take their places on the Kinemacolor staff in Lowville.

Mr. Hickey says he selected Lowville owing to its wonderful natural possibilities and also for the fact that the Kinemacolor players would have the benefit of quiet, homelike surroundings while engaged in their work.

Mr. Hickey still retains his foreign interests, but intends to remain in this country for several months until all the details of the new venture are well under way. In connection with the American productions Mr. Hickey has already planned and now has under way a number of big feature productions in England and France, among them Maeterlinck's "Bluebird" and "Mary Magdalen," with Mme. Maeterlinck in the title role. A great many of the subjects made at Lowville will be placed in the regular Kinemacolor service, although a number of big productions suitable for presentation in the leading theaters will also be made.

M. P. Men and Insurance Rates

The Views of an Official of the New York Fire Insurance Exchange.

MOVING picture men anywhere within the limits of the city in search of information as to insurance will in nine cases out of ten hear something to their advantage by calling on Henry Siemer, the rate fixer on the 12th floor of the Underwriters Building, 123-133 William Street. Mr. Siemer is an insurance expert and has a very fair working knowledge of the motion picture industry as related to the science of insurance. To a representative of the Moving Picture World Mr. Siemer talked most interestingly on the attitude of the New York Fire Insurance Exchange toward the men who make, distribute and show moving pictures.

"Whoever," he said, "has any idea that moving pictures are being discriminated against by us in fixing the rates of insurance, had better revise his opinion. We are students and want to learn conditions all the time and we certainly give the moving picture men credit for every improvement they have made in the films or in the machines or in the manufacturing. We give them practical credit, too, by lowering their rates of insurance. Four years ago the rates were one dollar for a hundred on all buildings in which moving picture theaters were located. To-day the rates are eighty cents per hundred dollars. Not only that, but we give the moving picture men due credit if they are running in fire-proof buildings. By a fire-proof building, I mean a building with brick walls, steel beams supported with two inches of Portland cement or re-inforced with concrete. On that kind of a building the rate is only sixty cents for a hundred dollars. Indeed, some buildings with moving pictures have been rated as low as thirty-five cents per hundred. Of course, you understand this relates solely to the buildings and not to the contents. When it comes to the contents of buildings in which moving pictures are located, we are touching another topic altogether."

Mr. Siemer remarked upon the fact of the many new moving picture theaters recently erected or now in process of construction which are fire-proof from the viewpoint of the underwriter.

"Your moving picture theater," he continued, "is on a far more favorable basis than the regular theater. We rate regular theaters at ninety cents a hundred, and if a moving picture theater machine and other apparatus are introduced into a regular theater the rates are increased. We think the moving picture theater safer than the regular theaters which are built on what we call 'balloon construction' and which are full of combustible materials. There's one thing I want to say right here. I understand that many moving picture screens are to-day treated with a highly combustible chemical imported from Germany. Moving picture men have told me that they would not dare to bring more than three gallons of this stuff into a place nor would they want to work with this secret process under artificial light. Then they ask me how would such work affect their insurance rates. Why it could affect the rates only in one way—we would make the rates as high as our schedules allow."

"What about the exchanges and factories of moving picture films?" Mr. Siemer was asked.

"Why, that opens up a big subject and I could not do justice to it in a short talk. I will say this, however. Let any exchange man or manufacturer come here and I will fix an equitable rate for him. Moving picture films to us mean just so much celluloid, the same as celluloid in collars or in any other substance. Exchanges would come under an entirely different rate from the moving picture theater. We place them in the 'mercantile occupancy' schedule. I would like to talk to exchange men on this subject and I think I could satisfy them that equitable rates could be fixed for them. Something might depend on whether the exchange is on the second or on the twentieth floor, but the difference would not be very material. I will be glad to answer any letter addressed to me by exchanges. but, of course, it would be hard to lay down uniform rules for all. Much would depend on the circumstances of each application—the location, neighbors, etc., might have an important bearing. As to manufacturers of moving picture films, why we place them in one category, with the wet plate photographer—that is plain enough I think. They handle essentially the same materials as the photographer."

Mr. Siemer defines celluloid as an explosive. That is the definition of the insurance companies. It is, however, altogether probable that the next four years will see a far greater degree of intelligence and liberality than we now dream of.

The insurance people are, as Mr. Siemer puts it, "studying things and conditions all the time and make due allowance for safety devices and general improvements." Mr. Siemer has seen the latest types of moving picture machine construction and admits the great progress that has been made.

"I have lectured," said Mr. Siemer, "on insurance in its relation to the moving picture industry and I want to deal with the question in a spirit of the utmost fairness. If any of your readers at any time feel that they have a complaint or grievance they may come here with the assurance that their grievance will be thoroughly looked into and any just grievance will be done away with."

The writer might add that Mr. Siemer is not a man deeply steeped in the technological terms of insurance and incapable of adjusting either himself or his profession to the rapidly changing conditions of modern times. On the contrary, he is willing and anxious to learn and he has a sympathetic understanding with the needs and views of the men who make, distribute and exhibit moving pictures.

General Film Exclusive Service.

A Very Commendable Plan Which if Successful Will Fill a Long Felt Want.

BEGINNING Monday, October 13, the General Film Company will inaugurate its new plan of exclusive service. This service has long been under consideration and the officers of the company think they have finally arrived at a practical system of operation that will prove eminently satisfactory to both sides of the arrangement. The object of this service is to give absolute protection to theaters in crowded localities and insure them of a program that cannot be duplicated or seen anywhere else within a specified jurisdiction.

The territory is to be determined by the exhibitor, who pays according to its extent and population. This puts the matter entirely within the financial range of the exhibitor. The Exclusive Service system will of course not be confined to any one house in a particular territory, but it means that whatever one house bargains for will be exclusive to that particular theater. The General Film Company is not prepared to say at this time just how many theaters it can serve in a given territory and keep them all clear, but unquestionably it can serve two, with probabilities of serving three or four.

According to the present plan, this service will consist of twelve reels per week for each theater. divided into three programs, one every other day. Each program will be made up of one multiple reel subject and two singles; in all, making three programs of four reels each for the week.

It is expected that there will be many who will be inclined to doubt the practicability of an exclusive service, but the General Film Company has devoted a great deal of time and thought to the matter for some months and is quite certain that it has evolved an entirely practical plan that will work smoothly from the start, and that if any changes are to be made they will be of a minor nature.

There are many advantages to a service of this kind, not the least of which is the very exclusiveness itself, to say nothing of the peace of mind it will bring, to the exhibitor who is relieved of the thoughts of what his competitor is going to have. Besides this it will have the effect of eliminating great waste of money in competitive advertising and at the same time will allow the theater to get the full benefit of whatever advertising it does put out, with no danger of someone else showing the subjects first and getting the benefit of such advertising. Among the other merits of the idea is the assurance of a superior program and the additional profit that will accrue from it, as well as the advantage of exclusive advertising.

It is not the purpose of the General Film Company to hold anyone to any contract. In fact there will be no contracts in connection with this service. It has been found that contracts have often proved irksome to one side or the other, especially as business conditions change, as they are doing at the present time; therefore, it has been deemed advisable to leave the exhibitor and also the General footloose in case everything does not work out as expected.

IOWA MEETING CALLED.

A meeting of the Iowa Motion Picture Exhibitors' League will hold its annual convention at the Auditorium, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, on December 3, 1913. There will be a limited amount of space available for manufacturers' exhibits, but the charge will be nominal. Communications should be addressed to W. C. Eddy, secretary, Marengo, Iowa.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

CALIFORNIA STATE CONVENTION.

Interesting Meeting Held at San Diego, Cal., September 9 to 12—Goddard of Sacramento Elected President.

C. W. Goddard
President-Elect California League.

REPRESENTATIVES from one hundred and eighty-seven picture houses, members of the California Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, met in convention at San Diego, Cal., on September 9, 10, 11, and 12. Charles Rothschild, president of the league, presided. State Secretary W. A. Cory and Treasurer W. H. Hilts were among those present. The business sessions were held in the ball room of the U. S. Grant Hotel, which was the headquarters of the convention.

On Tuesday, at 3 o'clock p. m., the first session of the convention was called to order. The roll of members was called and committees on credentials, and resolutions were appointed. Vacancies on the auditing and other committees were filled and an adjournment was taken until 10 a. m. on the following day. In the evening a trip was made to Wonderland Pier, a new beach resort.

On Wednesday morning the report of the credential and auditing committees were received. The entire day was devoted to business, three sessions being held. During the afternoon and evening the ladies who attended the meeting were entertained by the ladies of San Diego, a trip to Coronado Hotel and Tent City being made.

Thursday morning was given over to a pleasure trip around San Diego bay. Two large launches were required to take care of the party. Motion pictures of the trip were made. In the afternoon there was a sight-seeing trip to Tia Juana, Mexico, where the curio shops were rummaged. A business session was held in the evening.

On Friday there was a trip to the Panama Exposition Fair Grounds in the morning and a business session in the afternoon, at which time officers were elected. This concluded the business of the convention and an adjournment was taken. In the evening there was a banquet at the U. S. Grant Hotel, Secretary Cory acting as toastmaster. During the festivities a token of appreciation was presented to President Hilts, of the San Diego Local, for the hard work he had done to make the convention a success. The presentation speech was made by Leo Kaufman, attorney for the league.

On Saturday the entire party went to Los Angeles and were royally entertained by the Universal Company at the Hollywood studios.

Much good work was accomplished by the California exhibitors. They buckled down to work from the first and kept at it till completed. A report of the proceedings of the National Convention at New York was made and a vote of confidence and loyalty to President Neff and the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America was taken favoring the National League unanimously and condemning those who were responsible for the bolt.

The charter of Los Angeles Local No. 5, was taken from that organization on account of its position in supporting Judge Tugwell, who joined the bolters in New York. It was reported that there is a strong sentiment among the exhibitors in Los Angeles and that a new organization would soon be formed in that city.

Resolutions were adopted requesting certain service from the manufacturers and objecting to the insertion of advertising matter in any picture. Other trade measures were adopted.

Plans were laid to secure the national convention for San Francisco in 1915. Sacramento was chosen as the place for the next state convention.

The following were elected officers of the California League for the ensuing year: C. W. Goddard, Sacramento, President; W. H. Hilts, San Diego, first vice-president; W. A. Cory, San Francisco, secretary; C. L. Merton, Oakland, treasurer; William Chaplin, Sacramento, sergeant-at-arms; Charles Rothschild, San Francisco, national vice-president.

During the convention a request from the national president that some member of the California League be named for the National Executive Committee resulted in the nomination of M. E. Cory, of San Francisco, for that position.

A resolution was adopted thanking Mr. Isadore Bernstein, manager of the Universal plant at Hollywood, and Mr. Laemmle, president of the company, for the royal reception given the exhibitors.

CALIFORNIA EXHIBITORS ENTERTAINED BY UNIVERSAL.

On the Saturday morning following the recent convention of the California League in San Diego, the exhibitors were met at Los Angeles by General Manager Bernstein, Director Henry McRae, Laura Oakley, Chief of Police of Universal City, and other prominent members of the Universal Coast Company, as well as a deputation of cowboys and cowgirls.

Business and pleasure were combined when pictures were taken of the exhibitors, together with cowboys, etc., all of which will figure in "The Cowboy Magnate" along with other scenes which were later taken and worked into the scenario in a natural and novel manner. Headed by the officers of the League, which included President C. W. Goddard, of Sacramento; Vice-President W. H. Hilts, of San Diego; W. A. Cory, the secretary and treasurer of the San Francisco branch, and others, the whole party of one hundred odd members, with their wives and some children, were taken to the Hollywood Studios and served a substantial breakfast. Following, they inspected the mechanical, property, laboratory and other departments at the studios and were then taken to the ranch at Universal city in autos, where they were joined by many other exhibitors from the city of Los Angeles.

California Exhibitors at Universal Plant.

During the day the exhibitors were entertained at luncheon at the ranch and were surprised to learn that the dinner placed before them consisted chiefly of the products of the ranch, either grown or fed. Following the dinner short speeches were made by various members of the Exhibitors' League and the Universal Company.

Cincinnati Operators Locked Out.

Some of the Members of Local No. 2 of the League Decline to Join Movement.

FOLLOWING in the wake of the labor troubles which have seriously affected Cincinnati in the past eight months, came the lockout of the union operators employed in moving picture theaters owned by members of the Cincinnati Local No. 2 of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. The lockout was inaugurated Monday, September 22, and resolved itself into a three-corned fight at the very beginning between the operators' union, members of the league where the lockout was declared at their theaters, and those members of the league who have refused to join in the lockout movement. Up to the present writing (September 27), there has been no violence. Several persons have been arrested for carrying banners in front of places where the lockout was inaugurated and others for littering the streets, by passing out cards presenting the union side of the controversy, but no disorderly scenes have been enacted.

The lockout came, it is said, by Attorneys Foster and Miller for the exhibitors, as the result of demands made upon the owners for an increase in wages of from $3 to $5 a day, with no Sunday work, for union operators. This the union men deny they have done, while the owners persist in stating that such a move was made by the union. The exhibitors assert that more than fifty theaters have replaced their union operators with non-union men imported into the city, while the union officials declare and have printed on cards the names of only twenty-one theaters which have been affected by the lockout.

Just how far the exhibitors who are in the movement will carry their fight to force the members of the league not already in the lockout movement to join, remains to be seen. The exhibitors who have employed non-union operators declare they are in the fight to a finish, as do likewise the union operators. The exhibitors state that each owner involved in the lockout movement has posted $300 bond to stay in the fight to the finish. They also declare they are not against the union in general. They assert, according to Attorney Foster's statement issued on Thursday, September 25, "that we want full right to our business. We are willing to employ union operators, but we must have full say of all our business, in that we must have jurisdiction, as to what employees we may employ and whom we may discharge, without being dictated to by labor union agitators."

Tuesday, September 23, the exhibitors at whose houses the operators have been locked out evolved the scheme of giving free shows, inviting the public to attend, in an effort to force the others to join in the movement. The plan was tried out in the Little Ghetto district in upper Central avenue, where one exhibitor gave free tickets to a show further up the street and opposite the theater of a member of the league who refused to join in the fight. It was the intention of the league to start this plan in other parts of the city, but it met with refusal on the part of some of the contending owners, who insisted that they could not see the feasibility of the plan. The scheme was then discontinued.

The following night, on upper Central avenue, the owners directly in the present trouble gave six reels, an ordinary ten-cent show, for five cents, and both their houses were jammed, while across the street the owner who had refused to join in the scheme gave, as an added attraction to his three reels for five cents, a performance by a company of minstrels. The plan was continued all week.

On Saturday, September 27, the union operators announced their first open attack on the show houses where their men have been locked out. Their attack was in two forms. They urged patrons of moving pictures to stand as pickets in front of the houses where non-union operators are at work and urge their friends not to attend such shows. Those members of the league who are opposed to the lockout movement have permitted their union operators and some who are involved in the lockout to address their audiences. Charles Ring, assistant business agent of the operators' union, said Saturday, that two theaters had already closed down because patrons refused to see pictures projected by non-union operators. Attorney Lem Miller, of counsel for the Exhibitors' League, stated that these theaters had closed down for reasons not connected with the lockout.

"We have not asked for higher wages," said Ring. "We have not even demanded the complete unionizing of theaters. Yet in locking us out they are giving as an excuse demands we never made. We are organized chiefly for self-protection."

The contending parties are playing to the public in an endeavor to have them attend those shows which favor their side of the argument. With both sides holding fast, there is every indication the trouble will continue throughout all of the week beginning Sunday, September 28.

James Hennegan, manager of the Lubin Amusement Company operating the Lubin theater on West Fifth Street, was removed by Mayor Hunt on Monday afternoon, September 22, as a member of the Moving Picture Operators' License Board. James Montgomery was appointed to the vacancy on the same day. The latter is an agent for a fire insurance concern. Mr. Hennegan's removal, it is understood, is due to complaints from moving picture proprieters that union operators were given the preference in the issuance of licenses.

Giving as precedents for his opinion four Circuit Court and one Supreme Court decisions, Judge Fricke, of the police court, on September 26, gave it as his belief that the mere carrying of banners in front of a place where a strike is in progress does not in itself constitute an offense. The opinion was the result of the arraignment of several men who had been arrested in front of moving picture theaters where union operators have been locked out.

The police are investigating the destruction of two fireproof screens at the Century Theater in Walnut Hills sometime on Thursday, September 25.

Exhibitors Charge Prejudice Against Non-Union Applicants.

Moving picture proprieters and union operators again aired their differences before a meeting of the Ways and Means Committee of council on Friday afternoon, September 26. There were times when it looked as though there might be a clash, but oil was spread on the troubled waters and the matter was confined to an oratorical contest. There were over a hundred owners and operators present, and it was apparent from the start that there was bad blood between the opposing factions. Attorney Foster for the owners had charged that the Licensing Board was unfair and that he could prove it if given time. The members of the Licensing Board were present to hear the charges. To maintain his contention of unfairness Mr. Foster introduced two expert operators and the examination papers of several men who had failed to pass. In several instances the experts testified that the questions on which the applicants had failed were sufficient to show that the man was capable to run a machine.

Chairman Peck asked if the owners would be satisfied with the appointment of a fair licensing board, about whose fairness there could be no question. Attorney Miller said the owners were opposed to any board while the present trouble between the owners and operators existed. The union operators demonstrated that they would be satisfied with such a board, and Attorney Miller called attention to this fact as bearing out his contention that the union was not fair. Attorney Pogue, for the union, said he had warned the operators to proceed legally and to not resort to any unseemly demonstrations. He said all the men wanted was a fair deal and he would use his best efforts to see they got it.

The hearing was postponed until Monday morning.

EAST NEW YORK EXHIBITORS.

At a meeting of the East New York Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York, held at the Rockaway Theater, 547 Rockaway Ave., Brooklyn, on September 30, the following officers were elected: Chairman, William H. Hollander; Vice-Chairman, Michael Warshower; Secretary, Charles Fisher. The following were present: A. Taffelstein, G. Barton, M. Kerman, H. Rosenberg, A. Freiberg, Mr. Friedle, J. Turtle, B. Levine, Mr. Spencer, R. Miller, Mr. Vergesslich, Mr. Forster, Miss Schwank, Mr. Reddy, M. Marias, and representatives from the following theaters were present: Kerman's vaudeville theater, Mt. Morris Auditorium, Saratoga Theater, Rockaway Theater, Old Post Office Theater, Saratoga Auditorium.

The chairman in opening the meeting told of the ills existing in that locality through unfair competition, such as giving souvenirs, running six or seven reels of pictures, and in some theaters the admission fee was two for five cents. This sort of thing, he stated, is obviously harmful to the good of our business and unfair to a majority of the exhibitors in Greater New York. A resolution was then passed that ten cents should be the admission fee charged on Fridays, Saturdays, and Sundays, and that at the next meeting to be held at the Saratoga Auditorium, 2026 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, the question as to the number of reels to be run will be thoroughly thrashed out and adjusted so that every exhibitor will show no more than four reels for five cents.

EXHIBITORS AT PEORIA CONVENTION.

The following exhibitors took part in the deliberations of the Peoria, Ill., convention, Sept. 23 and 24: I. C. Davidson and W. H. Ogle, the Central, Danville; Wm. Schafer, the Imperial, Peoria; C. E. Tortat, the Illinois, Peoria; W. W. Watts, the Vaudette, Springfield; Thomas Leonard, Opera House, Johnston City; O. W. Friederich, the Capitol, Pekin; Mrs. Emma J. Striewing, the Crystal, Decatur; Mrs. Musa Reese, the Aereo, Charleston; Thomas O'Dowd, the Colonial, Witt; Louis H. Frank, the Coronada, Chicago; C. C. Montgomery, the Royal, Peoria; E. C. Bostick, the Court, Pekin; Chas. J. Law, the New Palace, Pana and Nokomis; J. G. Gesell, Nickeldome, Bloomington; C. E. Keysner, the Bijou, Mattoon; F. S. Russell, the Rex, Shelbyville; C. E. Steinhardt, the Columbia, Peoria; L. J. Van Duaska, the Majestic, Ottawa; Harry C. Daley, Opera House, Carlinville; Dee Robinson, the Princess, Peoria; Jabes Skelton, the Princess, Bloomington; F. M. Bond, the Bond, Pontiac; Will Bradley, the Crescent, Ottawa; C. C. Carrier, the Empress, Peoria; F. W. Schaefer, the Crystal and other theaters, Chicago; J. D. Rose, the Marion, Chicago; P. B. Francis, the Hippodrome, Peoria; E. F. Harris, the Columbia, Peoria; Eugene Sparrow, the Electra, Eureka, and John T. Laffey, the Savoy, Delevan. There were also present: Clem Kerr, of Dayton, Ohio, organizer of the M. P. E. L. of A.; John Corcoran, manager of the Aereo, Charleston, and T. F. Wesley, state organizer of the M. P. E. L. of A.

Manufacturers' Exhibits, Etc.

The following representatives of manufacturers' supplies, etc., were present: The Rudolph Wurlitzer Co. had several of their automatic musical instruments on hand and attracted large crowds during the convention. T. D. Waiss, department manager, Chicago; F. H. Hodson, salesman for the Chicago and Peoria offices; E. G. Maszha, demonstrator, and Henry Frank, were busy all the time with visiting exhibitors. I understood they took quite a number of orders for their fine instruments. S. J. Newman, secretary and treasurer of the Newman Mfg. Co., Cincinnati, had an attractive exhibit on the mezzanine floor, just outside the convention hall. Mr. Newman was quite surprised himself at the number of orders taken for his brass poster frames and easels. J. E. Robin, sales manager for the Precision Machine Co., Inc., was another active man during the convention. He was also well pleased with the patronage given him.

I noticed quite a fine showing of advertising matter, in the convention hall, of "Electra" pink label carbons, the distribution being attended to by Clem Kerr. The Mutual Film Corporation, Majestic branch, Chicago, was represented by George Berg, who has charge of the feature department. Mr. Berg showed "The Battle of Gettysburg" on Tuesday evening, and it was received with loud acclaim. Alexander Lichtman, sales manager of the Famous Players Film Co., of New York City, came all the way from Toronto to attend the convention. Mrs. Fisk, in "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," was also presented on Tuesday evening to an admiring gathering. JAS. S. McQUADE.

OKLAHOMA EXHIBITORS.

The directors of the Oklahoma State Branch No. 23, held a meeting in Oklahoma City recently. The purpose of the meeting was to review affairs of the League and get ready for the next meeting which takes place at Tulsa on October 29th and 30th. R. H. DeBruler tendered his resignation as Secretary, because he was unable to give the office the time and attention it required. His resignation was accepted, and L. W. Brophy, of Muskogee, Oklahoma, was appointed secretary for the unexpired term. This takes the League headquarters to Muskogee.

The directors' report shows that the League has accomplished much in this state in avoiding and defeating vicious legislation, especially the Sunday closing law. It has also been successful in side-stepping all state and local censorship interference. The activity of the League and the fact that the state branch is a part of the national organization have given members considerable prestige with thinking people. A membership card in front of the smallest theater in the state is a dividend paying proposition for its proprietor.

The next meeting, which is to be held at Tulsa during the Dry Farming Congress on October 29th and 30th, is to be one of the greatest meetings ever held in this state. It is hoped to have President Neff at the Tulsa meeting.

Tulsa, by the way, is booming. It is the livest town in the entire southwest, being the oil headquarters for Oklahoma. It is also the home of the State National Vice-President, Carl Gregg, and State Treasurer, Wm. M. Smith. Our present state secretary also has a motion picture theater in Tulsa. All of the Tulsa exhibitors have agreed to donate liberally, and help make the affair a grand success. Members of the Oklahoma State Branch, as well as members of adjoining states, should not fail to notify Mr. Carl Gregg at least ten days in advance to secure hotel accommodations for them, as the city will be crowded to its utmost during the Dry Farming Congress, which is an international affair.

KANSAS EXHIBITORS TO MEET.

The Kansas State Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America will hold its third annual convention on October 20-21, at Hutchinson, Kansas. President C. E. Glamann is giving his personal attention urging members and non-members of the League to make every effort possible to attend this important meeting. State Organizer Jack Brainard, of Mulberry, Kansas, has increased the membership of the State Branch nearly fifty members since the national convention. There are many matters of importance that will be taken up at the meeting and every exhibitor in the state should arrange his affairs so that he can attend this meeting.

National Vice-President E. Wayne Martin is chairman of the Convention Committee, and this alone will assure that the exhibitors visiting Hutchinson will be well taken care of. For further information address Mr. Martin, care of the Martin Theater, Hutchinson.

STANLEY TWIST LEAVES SELIG.

On September 27, after a service covering several years, Stanley H. Twist retired as publicity manager of the Selig Polyscope Company, Chicago, Ill. The announcement of his resignation came as a surprise to his many friends, most of whom had considered him to be a fixture for life with the Selig Co. Mr. Twist says that it was like pulling teeth for him to leave Mr. Selig, whom he thinks is the finest man he ever worked for. It is the intention of the erstwhile Selig dopester to locate in New York. He is at present considering several good offers, but on account of his reticence the supposition is that he is getting ready to embark in the film business for himself.

Goodwin vs. Eastman.

T. H. Blair, a Pioneer, Throws Interesting Historic Side Lights.

THE recent decision of a Federal Court upholding certain claims of patents of the Ansco Company against the Eastman interests has given rise to a great deal of discussion among the pioneers in the manufacture of raw stock. Incidentally this discussion throws its interesting historic sidelights and for this reason alone some mention of it in these columns seems entirely appropriate. The daily press took strong sides with the plaintiffs in the suit against Eastman. The plaintiffs' claim was based entirely upon the invention of the Rev. Hannibal Goodwin now deceased. The Ansco interests are the inheritors of the Goodwin claims. Now comes another pioneer, T. H. Blair, who takes strong exception to the views of the daily press concerning the merits of the Goodwin invention. Mr. Blair sharply raises the question: "What did the Reverend Hannibal Goodwin do for film photography, which is the basis of all motion pictures?"

"My answer is, he (Goodwin), did nothing, absolutely nothing for the industry except to try and throttle it. He may have started with philanthropic intentions but when he made his application for a patent covering the claims which he did, all semblances of working for the benefit of modern civilization automatically ceased, and the incentive of his efforts became more and more pronounced as he struggled to maintain and even strengthen these claims after seeing large sums of money going into the industry to develop what he was endeavoring to get a grip on. His application for a patent, even when made public, showed no one how to make anything in a commercial way, nor did he make any effort worth mentioning to put his alleged invention in public use.

"Let me take you back to the early days of amateur photography. At its very inception there arose the feeling of great need for more compact apparatus, less and less weight, more convenient methods of getting the sensitive surface in position before the lens to receive the picture, etc. This need all of us pioneers were struggling in our own way to meet. To come abruptly to the point in issue—prior to or during the year 1884, the present Mr. Eastman and others associated with him turned their attention to a flexible support for this sensitive surface. The first results of their efforts gave the public a paper film or to speak more properly, a photographically sensitive surface supported by paper, some of which could be printed through by making this paper translucent or semi-transparent. I shall not attempt to discuss the merits or faults of any of these early products, for this is neither a treatise or history of film, but it is necessary to first get into mind and keep there, conditions which existed at the time as well as early facts that lead up to the application for the Goodwin Patent which has now become celebrated in a period of time usually expressed in the term 'overnight.'

"When this paper film was offered to the public it was accompanied by apparatus in which to use it in a practical way and although the process of developing and handling the film was awkward and the apparatus bulky from present knowledge, it was a commercial product, created a business and set a new line of thought in motion. Since that time Mr. Eastman has been in the film business and from time to time has drawn in other interests and capital, creating stockholders many of whom doubtless were more or less dependent on the earnings of the industry.

"Even before the advent of the Eastman paper film, celluloid in flexible sheets was well known and was being used as a support in making photographic film by Mr. Frank Rowell, of the Allen & Rowell Co., of Boston, later merged into the Blair Camera Co. These sheets usually between 5 and 6 feet long were, however, cut up into glass plate sizes after being coated, but before used, taking the place of the glass plate in the holder. This film with celluloid as a base was manufactured and sold in a commercial way as early as 1883. The output was very small compared with the present day, but everything was done then in a very small way compared with the present. These celluloid sheets were made by the Celluloid Co., whose main factories were and still are in Newark, N. J., the home of Mr. Goodwin.

"Whether or not Mr. Goodwin knew of Mr. Rowell's work, before he made his application for a patent, I am unaware. During the latter part of the eighties (I believe 1889) the Eastman Co. put on the market a film with a celluloid base which was received with open arms by the public. Nothwithstanding this reception, getting the film industry really started came near swamping Eastman and his company if not some of his backers. At any rate, records will show that there was a period which included 1893 that the Eastman Co.'s stock could hardly be given away, as it was unable to pay a dividend on its capital (about four million) for several years.

"During the year 1890, the company which I had founded years before also commenced experiments preliminary to manufacturing photographic film with celluloid support and in order to bring into it what experience we could command, took over Mr. Rowell and the Allen, Rowell Co. Mr. Rowell was by nature scientificially inclined and while able as a photographic chemist had but little resource in things mechanical which necessitated my devoting considerable time to the work personally and engaging a mechanical expert. The task I undertook for myself and co-worker was to coat celluloid in two or three hundred feet lengths without any joints and about 20 inches wide made by the same celluloid company before mentioned and delivered to us in rolls. Mr. Rowell's coating had been on pieces short enough to hang up and fasten to the wall to prevent curling into tubes when drying. This could not be done with the present length. The coating was done in substantially the same manner, but the caring for it after coating was our main difficulty. Mr. Eastman stated in giving testimony before it was accomplished that it was a mechanical impossibility, but we did it or rather devised machinery and apparatus that did it in a practical way, capable of great extension, although it took us many months longer than we expected and cost several times as much money as anticipated. In fact, the doing of it directly and indirectly so crippled the company and shook the stockholders' confidence in my ability to estimate costs that we really never recovered and I was forced to seek new capital to go on with my work.

"Briefly, before I had heard of Mr. Goodwin and his experiments I had built the special machinery and equipped three separate and distinct plants, building new buildings for two of these plants. One of the plants was in England and the other two in Massachusetts.

"My patent covering this process was issued in 1897, and early in 1898 and before the issue of the Goodwin patent, the Eastman Company bought out both companies I had formed in America and adopted our system, which is known as the rotary system and I understand is the system used exclusively by them ever since. By this purchase they became the owners of a film coating industry established in 1883, a date I believe earlier than that fixed by Mr. Goodwin as the commencement of his researches.

"Mr. Rowell never applied for any patent, being a large broad-minded man of the older school and knowing that celluloid sheets transparent as glass was an article much used. Evidently he did not feel he was entitled to one, although he was giving the public the benefit of a photographic film having a celluloid support. He did not work in secret, but showed several others all details of the work. As to the thickness of this film—who is to say what is the correct thickness? The celluloid coated by Mr. Rowell was one thickness, that made by the Eastman Company, was very thin and that made by my company was between the two, while the average of that now made for cinematograph is between the thickness of the Rowell and the Blair brands.

"Owing to the thinness of the Eastman film, I am able to say the Blair film was the first used in commercial motion picture work in the world, for Edison used film made by my company exclusively in the father of all practical or commercial motion picture machines, viz: the old 'peephole' Kinetiscope, although he must have used the Eastman in his early experiments because the Blair film was not a reality early enough."

TRUE FEATURES GOING WELL.

The True Feature Company, of 110 West 40th Street, New York, which distributes the product of the Continental Art Film Society and other big European releases on the North American continent, announce their latest sensation, a five-reel production called "'Twixt Heaven and Earth." The success of this feature it is expected will rival their other releases, of which the "Doom of Darkness" and "The Cyclist's Last Lap" have won quick popularity. The Electric Theater Supply Company, of Philadelphia, well known to exhibitors in Pennsylvania, New Jersey and the South, have just closed a contract with the True Feature Company for all their releases.

DEBUT OF A PRESS AGENT.

Elmer J. McGovern was, last week, appointed publicity and advertising manager of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, Long Acre Building, New York City. Mr. McGovern has extensive advertising and publicity experience, being until recent date advertising manager of one of the motion picture trade papers.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by CLARENCE E. SINN

More About Organ Music.

FROM Waterloo, Iowa, K. E. R. sets forth his ideas on organ music in the following words:

> I have followed your department in the Moving Picture World with interest and profit and was especially interested in the "organ music" article in the issue of September 13th, for it hits me exactly. I have been here since August 1st, in a fine large house (the Rex), and we will have a very good organ by October 1st. Playing the pictures is new work to me and altho I believe, and have been told, I do it fairly well, I also do not seem to have acquired the earmarks of the veteran and accepted body of moving picture piano players.
> The powers that be, always put the best of everything in their houses; they want the best projection, the best films and the best actors. Then why do they insist on rag-time popular music instead of standard or classical? In the suggested music for pictures they select those numbers whose titles fit the picture. In the first place, popular music is largely made up of fancy and semi-burlesque titles—nothing that really suggests the character of the music, and if the hearer doesn't happen to know the music or title, it misses fire. Why shouldn't one choose music whose titles truthfully tell the music, or music whose characteristics fit the picture, so everyone can feel the appropriateness of music and picture? Do not most piano players improvise or compose as their fancy and imagination dictates? Would not music selected from various sources and good composers be more apt to be effective than aimless and often brainless wandering over the keys; or is this method so much an accepted "earmark" that one must follow it or be forever shut out from the coveted fold? What is the recognized advanced idea about playing various selections during the show; also about the use of effects and a drummer in a small orchestra?

Ideas as to "playing the pictures" are many and varied. As to where and by whom any of them are "recognized," the question is problematical, and it would be more correct to say they are advancing rather than advanced. Performers play, and managers request them to play, popular music because they believe their public desires that sort of thing. In the average mixed audience there are many, of course, who prefer this to classic or standard music, but there also are many who do not. It seems to me that both should be considered in a theater whose mission is to amuse, entertain and sometimes instruct. The chief objection to popular music lies in its abuse rather than its use, and the performer who confines himself to this kind not only neglects his opportunities, but an important part of his audience. Some picture-organists have told me they would not debase or cheapen the instrument by playing rag-time or popular music upon the organ. I wouldn't care to argue this as it depends so much upon the individual point of view. It seems to me that really cheap music not only cheapens the instrument, but the player and hearer as well. The question in my mind would be as to where to draw the line between "popular" and "cheap" music; some of it is plain junk and easily recognized; much of it is worthy—for example, "Silver Threads Among the Gold," "Love's Old Sweet Song," "Wearyin' For You"—all of them popular and likewise easily placed. But many modern songs might contain some merit, be well known, and possess titles apropos to certain situations, and yet be rejected by some, though accepted by others. It depends on the point of view; it also depends on the class of audience you are catering to. Then again, not all the pictures are of the same calibre. You would hardly play music of the same grade for "Ivanhoe" and "Mutt and Jeff." But the question of "popular" music being played by picture-organists is too big to be answered off-hand by anybody, and will adjust itself in time. Meanwhile it would be interesting to know just how large an influence the pipe-organ in the picture theater is going to have on the musical taste of the public. The rising generation may find out that other musical forms exist beside two-steps and waltzes, and may even learn to like them.

While music for the picture has undoubtedly advanced enormously in the past decade, it is still in too chaotic a state to be said to have a defined technic of its own. The many "methods" and "systems" of individuals—while satisfactory to themselves—are too widely divergent to be regarded in any instance as an accepted method. When we have separated the gold from the dross we shall have a working basis, and the picture musicians themselves are now, by an exchange of ideas, making their own text-book. I should like to hear from more organists. I should like to learn the prevailing opinion regarding standard and classical music as applied to picture work. Do they (the organists), try to play music in keeping with the picture? Do they stop the music because they have played to the end of the number rather than the end of the scene, or do they lengthen it by repetition, addition or some other means to make it "come out even"? In other words, do they play to the picture or simply play a good concert program regardless of the picture? What do they think of popular music; should it be omitted entirely? In a theater where music is furnished solely by an organ, should the performer play only high class music or should his program be as varied as is the picture program? What should be played for a lively broad comedy? Remember, the best composers have given us plenty of lively music; remember also that many people like to hear a good "rag." (Lots of folks think there are good "rags.")

Come on in, you fellows; the water's fine.

Sound Effects.

The same correspondent inquires also about sound effects. The use of these depends altogether upon the attitude of your manager and your audience. Many people will not tolerate sound effects; on the other hand, many will. Some folks like to hear them. My own position has always been this: If you use sound effects, make them consistent. Don't try to get a laugh where none was intended. Don't do anything to spoil the effect of the picture. Make them as correctly as possible, and don't use cheap toy's when good traps are so available as they now are. If you can't afford to put in a good line of traps, don't put in any.

Dramatic Music.

Des Moines (another from Iowa), asks: "Would you play only dramatic music for all dramatic pictures?"

Dramatic music really is any music that intensifies a dramatic situation. In pictures like "From the Manger to the Cross" or "Quo Vadis?" there occur scenes in which religious music is intensely dramatic. "My Old Kentucky Home" is a simple ballad, yet there have been many pictures of the south in which this (or similar songs), have added greatly to the pathetic scenes, and in this sense they become dramatic music. The same may be said of "Auld Robin Gray" (in the Vitagraph picture of that name), or, in fact, of any kind of music that accents any dramatic scene in an appropriate manner. I presume, however, the correspondent refers to the "melodramatic music" of which a quantity is now on the market. If so, I shall say "no" to his question. Melodramatic music has its value, certainly, when used with discretion; in fact there are often times when nothing else seems to answer, but it should be played only when the situation demands it. Don't try to force any one kind of music on all your pictures. Use it; don't abuse it. It is a good idea to have enough of this in your repertoire so that you don't have to constantly repeat yourself for scenes of similar character.

CUTTING THE FILM IN THE WRONG PLACE.

TWO films were released on the same day last week by different firms, each having the same fault from the standpoint of the writer, who must contend that when a film is intended to teach any lesson of value the final points must not be lost in ambiguity. That the same fault was noticeable in each case would indicate that a kindred thought dominated the minds of the directors under whom the subjects were produced, and that they were of the opinion that any moral application could be applied by each observer at will.

In the "Hand of Destiny," a young man is saved from fearful crimes presumably by the hand of destiny. Some thrilling scenes are shown and some strong moral points developed which are worthy as leading to a valuable conclusion. Strange to say, however, when delivered from the evil which tempted him, and realizing what a narrow escape he had from wrecking his own family, the subject suddenly stops. So abrupt is the end that it seems as though the film had been cut to time or length without thought of any possible incompleteness being noticed. It would seem that just at this moment a grand opportunity presented itself to crown the strong moral lesson with a scene of the happy results accruing to the victory which the hand of destiny had made possible. If the film had need of cutting there were numerous places where a little shaving could, without loss, have been made; to cut off the end and leave it like a cheap novel with a "they lived happy ever after" sort of finish is an unworthy ending of an otherwise good subject. This is a case where a good story is not spoiled in the telling, but in the manner in which it ended.

In like manner "Slanderer's Tongue" is drawn out so that a good finish is made impossible. The innocent victim of the slanderer is rescued—in a moment of imminent danger, and amid the thrilling incidents of the rescue the picture ends. From an educational standpoint we do not always stop to consider either the scenario or the ideas of the director. Whenever a valuable story has a moral or a lesson of value, the whole is lost unless it is brought to such a conclusion that the main object for which it is evident the subject was written is attained. Each of these two good pictures lost much of its value because of the lack of finish. One scene more, a few feet of film, a completion, and these pictures would, in the hands of the evidently capable directors, have increased the power of the subject, and have made complete a strong lesson, tremendously educational under certain circumstances. If any cutting must be done let not the most essential parts suffer.

Notes.

During the last few weeks several subjects which have appeared in the Educator have also found their way to the columns of the daily press, in each instance at a later date than the date of issue of this paper. In one instance the matter was copied direct, in the other instances it was a singular coincidence, evidencing the fact that the same topics of educational kinematography are considered of importance by the purveyors of that news which is acceptable to the general public.

An educational paper, The School Journal, has under the title of "En Route," included a practical use of the moving picture in connection with school work as of great advantage to both teacher and scholar. This is perhaps one of the earliest instances in which a periodical of authority in public schoolwork has made so decided a stand in favor of the value of the moving picture. Another educational paper with commendable (?) conservatism declared that it could not indorse the moving picture in the schools until the talking accompaniment was perfected; a piece of most profound wisdom, similar to that which admonished the boy not to venture in the water until he had learned to swim.

Travel, scenery, scientific, manners and customs, microscopic and natural history subjects still continue to be released in commendable numbers by the few firms making such subjects a part of their steady output. This list, however, shows a decline in the production of historical, biblical, geographical and the larger life in natural history subjects. Let us not lose sight of the fact that it is the latter class of pictures that lead the way in all educational institutions, and that the former class follow afterward. Any delay in producing that which leads will have a corresponding deterrent effect upon those that follow, which again in turn may suggest a falling off in interest in the scholastic world; by keeping ahead with the leading subjects is the only way to secure the strong and permanent growth of the uses of the educational moving pictures.

FAME AND THE PICTURE.

The moving pictures have made many reputations. Both fame and fortune have already been the portion of some of the favored sons of the kinematograph. What shall be the test of the abiding good and beneficial results of all that the moving picture has wrought for humanity? While some have enjoyed the favors of fortune, others have been the victims of misfortune, the fickleness of both fame and fortune have ever attended the path of the moving picture as it has every great addition to the onward march of the world's progress.

John Bunny, as the King of the Mardi Gras, is the proof of that fame which is vanity; but John Bunny as the king of humorous actors is powerful in the molding of that side of human nature which must be cheered and lightened ere it become monotonous, morose and sordid; therefore his reputation as king of humor will last longer than that of the king of fun. The final test of all that becomes famous is in the assurance that it must give the world something of abiding good. Fame without virtue and profit to another is vain; true fame cannot be selfish; the more the moving picture becomes famous, the more it must become beneficial to the large number of people. Fame always pursues the road where most people travel; it must live in public, it must scatter in a wide path its many gifts, and those gifts must be richly saturated with the virtues of life. One maker of films has adopted the emblem of fame as the trade mark of his productions. This, however, does not prevent the whole world from knowing that the moving picture is a fame maker, a reputation giver, a character builder, a world educator. At this early stage of the moving picture's reputation the honors of fame and fortune have not been very widely distributed, the favored few are well and conspicuously known; some to great honor, some to less honor and some with no honor at all. The future holds the key to the situation. The time is coming when true fame will not be void of virtue, and virtue is education.

POWER'S MACHINE AT FIRE CONVENTION.

The 41st annual convention of the International Association of Fire Engineers held at the Grand Central Palace, New York City, from September 1st to 6th, was a great success and well attended. Like all great gatherings, it would have been incomplete without the moving picture. This convention was a most comprehensive affair, there being fire chiefs from every section of the world.

Included among the exhibitors (and the only one of its kind) was Power's Cameragraph, the well-known moving picture machine. Its fire prevention devices received favor. The exhibit was well patronized by the fire chiefs whose comments were many and favorable.

"The Reformation," a single reel Kay-Bee, advertised for release Friday, Sept. 26, has been moved further down the calendar, and "The Forlorn Hope," another single reel, was released on that date.

OBSERVATIONS
BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

AMONG the first to come forward with expressions of condolences to those bereaved by the death of Mayor William J. Gaynor should be the people interested in the production and exhibition of motion pictures. It would be but a faint recognition of the deep gratitude they owed the distinguished official for the sturdiness he displayed in their behalf at times when the combined influences of the great political organizations, the so-called reform individuals and societies and others were arrayed against them. Both as a Judge of the Supreme Court and Mayor of this great city, his rulings and actions in behalf of the motion picture people established precedents that have not only formed a basis for their protection in this immediate field, but have become a guide for the exhibitors throughout the country and the law makers of their respective communities. It was the strong mind and hand of the departed Judge that reversed the action of a weak and misguided mayor who, with one sweep of his pen, wrought a loss of thousands of dollars to the exhibitors of this city; and Judge Gaynor saved them from greater losses by promptly reopening their theaters pending the determination of the questions at issue in a legal and constitutional manner.

When the censor cranks had the whole country aroused and had framed up, with the assistance of influence in the background, a scheme that would have at least badly crippled the motion picture business, the lamented Mayor put in play his resources as a jurist with such effect that he completely destroyed the plans of attack and routed the enemy. His opinion on the constitutional aspect of the censorship question in its relation to the motion picture business stands unchallenged. Some of the "reformers," rather stool pigeons of powerful influences, threatened to test the opinion in the courts, but the weight of it was too much for them. The last act of Mayor Gaynor in behalf of the motion picture exhibitors was of so recent date that it is hardly necessary to detail his whipping into line of the Board of Aldermen, who had for months been as puppets in the hands of the politicians and capitalists arrayed against the ordinance for increasing the seating capacity of picture houses.

A newspaper has suggested as one of the epitaphs for the tomb of the departed official the words "I Have Been Mayor." No more appropriate inscription reflecting a career of loyalty to oath of office and fidelity and fearlessness in the performance of duties pertaining to it could be conceived. Another suitable inscription is "Protector of Constitutional Rights." Mayor Gaynor had many friends and many enemies, as some of the newspapers say. The motion picture people rank with the former. He won them by his voluntary acts of justice in their behalf.

It has been said that the reason the departed Mayor so often ruled in favor of the motion picture interests was that his son was engaged in the business. The assertion is entirely without foundation. The nearest approach to anything that can be construed to sustain the statement must be founded on the fact that his son was in the motion picture department of a newspaper, but he was not so engaged at the times when the Judge and Mayor stood by the picture people when they most needed him. If influenced at all by personal attachment in what he did it was the Mayor's liking for motion pictures. He took an interest in them and looked upon them as an educational factor, and a great source of entertainment for the masses. The Mayor was frequently in the company of producers and exhibitors and shared with them in the belief that the pictures are in their infancy as an important factor in the field of education, science, entertainment and other practical purposes.

A report is current that one of the foremost American manufacturing companies is engaged in perfecting a newspaper bulletin apparatus whereby motion picture views of events of the day are to be interspersed with the regular bulletins. It is claimed that this can be done at a much smaller cost than has been figured heretofore. The interest manifested by the people in weekly and semi-weekly reproductions of events in the motion picture theaters has put ginger into the bulletin proposition. According to the report, the views will be taken by a staff of cameramen scattered about the country under the direction of a company similar to the news service bureaus and will be alloted to subscribing newspapers. It is also intimated that some of the news associations are ready to establish moving picture camera departments as soon as a bulletin apparatus is perfected and newspapers install it. Nothing official has been given out regarding the apparatus or plans. Thus far the talk comes principally from quarters frequented by motion picture camera operators, who are pinning considerable faith to the report. They feel that its confirmation will open a big field for their services.

A well known newspaper man who has the reputation of getting in touch with the first outcrop of the current events states that he has not been able to verify the report concerning motion picture bulletins, but says he feels certain something of that kind is on the way. He is enthusiastic over the idea and expresses confidence in its ultimate perfection. He also states that he has discussed the matter with many people engaged in the newspaper and periodical business, as well as many in the motion picture field, and criticism of the project is limited to the publishers of illustrated weeklies, which is weakened by a spirit of self-interest. Such weeklies, he said, are rapidly passing away and would be completely wiped out by the motion picture bulletin. Motion picture people, when asked if their interests would be affected by such a project, should the newspapers turn the films over to picture theaters after the bulletin service, replied in the negative.

When spoken to regarding the project, a well known exhibitor said, "From the newspaper standpoint it would be a winner and for us it would be a good business builder. The more people are brought in touch with motion pictures by outside sources the more our patronage increases. The outside association brings us business. But we could not hold our patronage with such views. The people are interested in them, but there is a limit to that interest. They are an appetizer. We could feature big events on a limited scale so the amusement part of our show would not be interfered with. I can see that many bulletin views would be worthless to us. Scenes of conflagrations, wrecks, floods, riots, etc., could be handled by us to good advantage, and big naval and other water displays, as well as parades and gatherings of national importance, would find welcome space upon our screens provided the delivery to us would not be too long delayed."

Another exhibitor took almost no interest in the matter. "It is too soon to express an opinion. There are many contingencies to be considered. Speaking off-hand I do think it would not be policy for me to take on such service. In the first place it would be second hand, and nothing in that line will go with our patrons. We must give it to them right off the reel, or not at all. We could not do business with something the public can get for nothing. If we used the same subjects the people would expect to see more of them than the bulletin boards would show, and that we could not give them. The people taking the views could not supply us because they would not take lengthy views subject to our approval and selection. The film companies now in business could not supply us because they have learned from experience that topical views on a competitive basis do not pay them. There was a time when nearly all the manufacturers had cameramen shooting about the country for important happenings, but when they found the exhibitors could not stand the additional cost, made necessary by the expense incurred, they dropped the business. Those who remained in the field do so because there is no competition. The use of important bulletin views would also depend upon the number of displays given them before reaching us. The number of newspapers using the views and the number of locations of displays would have a very important bearing on our service. Yes, possibly the service bureaus and newspapers could make arrangements for direct service to us so that the displays in our houses would be simultaneous with those on the bulletin boards, but here, too, arise contingencies. Hurry-up movies will not be taken with the same degree of certainty that attaches to news sent over the wire, and some views that might pass with some degree of satisfaction on the bulletin boards would fail completely on our screens. In any event the bulletin project will not interfere with our business."

And Stamps.

MORE than once we have spoken of the foolishness of giving too many reels for a five cent admission—or a ten cent fee, for that matter, but what may be said of the man who not only runs seven reels of pictures for five cents, but throws in trading stamps as well?

Just as a matter of fact the situation supplies its own answer. Since the management is running a bargain counter and not a theater, the stamps are the natural complement of the "Cheap John" method The stamps are only distributed Monday and Thursday afternoons, but why should they be needed at all? The presentation of three good reels for that price would, in the long run, prove a more potent attraction than seven reels of what must be more or less junk.

If the manager, in this case F. Greenburg, of the Lyceum Theater, Peoria, Ill., were the only person to suffer, there could not be much objection, but every picture theater in Peoria is cheapened by the action of one unthinking person. There used to be a class of itinerant vendors known as "Cheap Johns" who, in an effort to sell one article, would add half a dozen premiums, and "Cheap John" became the synonym for the blatant pushing of worthless stock. In much the same way the "Cheap John" methods of certain exhibitors bring discredit not only upon themselves, but upon the managerial body as a whole, and it is most unfortunate that some few exhibitors can, without restraint, run an excess of reels and a series of premium schemes to win a fleeting patronage, since they are unable to win a permanent clientele by clean-cut and business-like methods. One theater not only gives a "transfer" to another house, but permits its patrons to commute these transfers into canned beans and corn. Now comes a house with seven reels for five cents and a trading stamp thrown in. Where is it going to end before poor management brings the inevitable conclusion?

A Civil Rights Decision.

We are indebted to John J. Farren, of the Victoria Theater, Rochester, N. Y., for the facts in a civil rights case recently brought against the Rochester Theater Company. A colored woman entered the house to hear the singing of a colored quartet, and refused to go to the balcony, to which her ticket admitted her. She was asked either to take the seat called for or obtain a refund of her money and leave. She left without accepting a return of her admission and brought suit under the civil rights law, which is aimed at discrimination on account of color. In court the decision was given for the house.

Mr. Farren writes that the house, which seats 1,600, is divided into blocks, three of these being on the lower floor and the other constituting the balcony. Primarily, the use of this device not only enables the house to be "dressed" when the business is slack, but prevents the competition from getting a line on the business through the serial number of the ticket sold. At the same time, the standing orders are to sell to negroes, Italians and the rougher element from Section D. The woman in question was sold a balcony ticket, but refused to sit in the balcony and brought suit, but without avail.

The civil rights law is an excellent thing on paper, but it does not always work out well. In the South the colored brother is given to understand that he must flock by himself or there will be trouble, but in the North the case is different and every now and then there seems to be an organized effort on the part of the negroes to make as much trouble as possible for theater managers, restaurant and hotel keepers and others, and reap the reward the suits will bring.

In Washington a number of years ago we broke into the theatrical business as usher in the balcony of one of the theaters. There they had a Section D for the colored patrons, and the box office man sold D to all colored applicants, but now and then a negro would hire a white boy to buy his tickets for him and turn up with seats in the white sections. In such a case the usher was instructed to drop the tickets on the floor and use a couple of D tickets with which he was provided. It was not strictly honest, perhaps, but it met guile with guile, and something of that sort was necessary in a low-price house.

The civil rights side of the trouble may not interest many managers, but all will be interested in the block system of ticket selling.

For a Second Load.

Geoffrey Jefferson, who wrote some weeks ago for advice about a college show, liked the information so much that he is back for a second load, and writes:

> Thank you for the suggestions you made in your issue of September 13.
> My father was given charge of obtaining the films and the motion picture shows (he is the Professor of Geography here); he turned it over to me, so you see my connection. You say a college of 1,400 should almost support a 900 house, but we started last winter, asking the film people to send us some film, but this did not work very well—they sent us 2 and 3 reels of scenics and, as some of the students expressed it, some "tame" dramas. Then we began to learn; I found the Moving Picture World, and the Normal subscribed for it. It was of great help to me last year. The Comments on the Films for the General Film were fine, and I always found them true. But we have got to live down these "tame" films, etc. I have booked "In the Coils of the Python" and "The Battle of Bull Con" for October 3. What do you think of those for a "mere" school? Also "Ivanhoe," October 11. Our students are (the girls) not allowed to receive callers any day, except Friday, Saturday and Sunday, and we cannot run, except the first two days, so we have some opposition (Ann Arbor U. of M. is only seven miles away, with electric cars every half hour). So you see what we are up against, but we hope to get them all going with 10 to 15 day Universal service and 200 or 300 feet of Gaumont Educational.
> How shall we go to work to outlive our "tame" dramas (except by not showing them)? For these first three shows I have ordered $10 worth of posters and photos for the 2 and 3 reel subjects. I have made arrangements with a local bill poster to place about 25 sheets (mostly 3 sheets) for each show at 4 cents a sheet. Now, when I have, as I do the first week, two good subjects as "In the Coils of the Python," October 3, and "Pelleas and Melisande," October 4, how am I to divide up the advertising? The boards will hold two 3-sheets side by side; on a good location would you place a 3-sheet for each night side by side or on different boards? What do you consider best, three or four 3-sheets on good locations about town and for anything like "Ivanhoe" a 6-sheet, or a lot of 1-sheet posters on these and some others?
> By the way, don't you thing the "Ivanhoe" posters are fine? Your suggestions on posting last week were good, but I want to know more than you told about, as I have asked above.
> It seems to me that you should get out a book on Advertising for Exhibitors, as Richardson did for Projection—which book, by the way, is very good—it's practical. You have samples submitted, the good paper advertising and programs could be illustrated—go to it.
> I note that you say that you think I spend too much time on my announcement slides. They are first lettered on drawing paper 9 x 12 inches in size, then photographed. I have tried to letter on the glass and some other ways mentioned, but I can't make them as good as the ones I use, and until I find something that will look as good on the screen, I shall continue to make them. That's the kind of results we try to get on our screen, ONLY first class.
> Why can't I buy pieces of colored glass and put them in the slide carrier to give the films the tinted effect? I have tried to get these of George Kleine, but he has none. Where can I get them? Of course, they must be light in color.
> Which do you consider best, poster advertising or in the daily papers, 15 cents per inch, the cost of a one-sheet poster? Or both.
> How is one to get a position in some theater, film exchange, or producing company? I want to know more about the film business than I do know, and at the same time finish at Massachusetts Institute of Technology. I have had two years' of college work.

Paper and Posting.

We think that Mr. Jefferson should be careful to avoid the ultra sensational in film or the college authorities may put out a stop order. "Tame" dramas may not make appeal, but with such subjects as "Ivanhoe" to draw from, certain lurid film subjects should be avoided. "In the Coils of the Python" does not class as lurid, of course, but his letter suggests that the success of such subjects may lead him on. A word of caution in season will be worth a lot of advice later on.

As to posting, we think that two subjects on a board will be better than two three-sheets of the same release on one board, and two of the other somewhere else. We also think that one good three-sheet is better than three one-sheets of one or varied subjects. The one-sheets permit the advertising of a greater variety of titles, but one three-sheet looms larger and is apt to have a better pulling power than three one-sheets, just as one six-sheet is generally worth a little more than two threes of the same subject. It stands out more boldly, catches the eye more quickly and "lasts longer" in the memory. All of this, in addition to the moral effect of the mental argument, that a subject with a three-sheet must be more important than a subject that boasts only a one-sheet.

At the same time, while paper is good, if the advertising appropriation averages $5 a night and newspaper space is but fifteen cents an inch, we think that the papers should be used as well as paper. From six to ten inches in the paper and twenty sheets of lithographs (counting the posting charges) will be a better combination than the few extra sheets of lithographs.

As to " living down the tame films," we do not believe that any effort in that direction will be necessary. The new attractions will speak for themselves. Business the first night or two may be light, but in a college or small town the facts of the change are quickly circulated. It might be well to get out a circular for the first night or so, giving enough of a hint at the story to show that the old order has been done away with, but it would be well to let the subjects speak for themselves.

Go to Ann Arbor.

But if the Ann Arbor boys come over to bother the Normal girls on visiting nights, it might be well to circularize the University and suggest that they come over to the Normal and take her to see the pictures.

It may interest others than Mr. Jefferson to know that a book on advertising uniform in style with the Handbook and Technique will soon form a part of the Moving Picture World Library. The matter has been in the hands of a compiler all summer.

We do not think that it is well to try for color effects other than those presented by the manufacturer. The use of glass will largely cut down the light on the screen (and therefore the brilliancy of the picture) with no compensating advantage. Kinemacolor uses geletain screens in a special shutter, and it might be possible to cover the shutter opening of the projection head, but we do not think that even Mr. Richardson can tell how to use colored glass in the slide carrier to tint a picture being projected as the slide carrier does not work when the projection mechanism is running and the use of a separate lamp would flood the entire screen with tinted light that would kill down brilliancy. We think Mr. Jefferson will do well to let well enough alone.

Mr. Jefferson might query the Boston exchanges relative to a position with them, but we think the exchange work would very seriously interfere with the Tech. course.

And lastly Mr. Jefferson might try making his slides on tracing paper and printing on glass by contact. This will give a marking to the clear portions that will be unusual.

Sound Talk.

S. Barret McCormick, in the Denver Times, looks at things through eyes that see. Apropos of the recent exploitation of sensationalism, he writes in his excellent motion picture department:

> It must prove a trying ordeal for the conservative and constructive exhibitor who, while clinging to his ideals and presenting an entertainment that he knows to be excellent, sees the apparent profits gleaned from the so-called "features" of a lurid and sensational type. Such productions, if they may be given that title, are sure to prove a boomerang and reflect discredit upon the business in general and especially upon those who have planted the seeds of decline. The solution surely lies with the exhibitor, in spite of his protests that the public demands it, for certainly photoplay has outgrown the museum days and the public mind is not so distorted that it must be whetted by crime and fed upon gory drama.

That's the matter in a nutshell. The motion picture business has passed beyond the museum stage. The trouble is that a lot of the exhibitors have not.

For Mr. Waldron.

It will please Mr. Waldron to learn that S. M. Farrar, of Eldorado, Ill., copied his town census paragraph and reports that it made for good business.

From Mr. De Subers.

So many have written in for more catchlines from Mr. De Subers, we print with pleasure this last batch. We have hopes that he will send more in. Several have asked for his address that they may arrange to get them direct, but we point out that Mr. De Subers is looking for a managerial job where his ability as a sign painter and ad writer will help.

Selma Explains.

We particularly like the booklet put out by the Academy of Music, Selma, Ala. The house is one of those that runs dramatic attractions when they come along and pictures in the interval. With a management like this we think that eventually it will turn straight pictures, because it makes good. We believe that R. B. Wilby, the manager, is responsible for the booklet. It is merely three out of four pages, bound in a yellow cover, with title in red and black. The red shows a large "speaker" type figure and a larger question mark. The title runs:

How can you give a
Show like that
For a dime

We are being Asked

This is the text in full:

> When it was seen that there was no bluff about our declaration that we choose the best three pictures from the five shipped us each day, and to these add the songs of some able singer and music by an orchestra of five, it was asked of us repeatedly how we managed to do it for ten cents admission. The answer, of course, is that we don't; that is for the aggregate receipts of a day that the show is given. But this means more to you than seems at first glance. Two years ago we published an advertisement in which it was argued that each dime you spend here not only brings you its value in immediate pleasure, but acts as an investment on which you draw dividends in the form of increased pleasure in the future; for, it was argued, we can spend on a program just a little less than we expect the aggregate audience to spend to see that program; so that the dime the individual spends to-day gives us the assurance that makes possible the increased merit of next week's bill. It is only by figuring it in this way that we have been able to bring up the standard program in this city from two reels of unselected pictures and piano music to the present selection from five films, a five-piece orchestra and a reputable singer. Conversely, should our attendance, for any reason, be reduced to two-thirds its present number, it naturally follows that we will ultimately be forced to reduce our programme correspondingly.
> It is therefore true that you, by your constant attendance at one house, are really helping that house give you more for your money each week, or, in a way, investing your money in such a manner that it will continue to work in your behalf even after you have drawn its full value at the time it is spent.
> Of course, this argument holds only when it takes into consideration the policy of a house. That is why we say to you that it means something that the ACADEMY OF MUSIC is not a leased property, but is operated for the owners with the idea of making it a permanent affair; that there can be no object in trying to "clean up" over a period of three or five years, then to turn it back as dry as a sucked orange. Nor do we face that possibility of a rent made extortionate through the success of our efforts. We can, in short, afford to build with confidence in the permanency of our building.
> When these things are true, the more patronage a house receives the better performance it will give, the more YOU can buy for your money. And anything that cuts that patronage materially, whether additional outside competition or a natural decline in attendance, must tend to reduce the quantity or the quality of the amusement offered by that house, must tend to reduce the power of YOUR money when spent for that particular thing. And so we declare to you that you are wiser in patronizing one house ALL OF THE TIME than in dividing your patronage with a mistaken idea that fostering competition will work for your gain—IT CAN NOT, that would be an economic impossibility.

We give the text in full, not alone because hundreds of houses can adapt the argument, but because it is a lesson in management as well. Instead of running any old eight reels that the exchange happens to send, they call for five and use the three best. They give enough and as good as they can get, but not too much. Any patron is bound to feel that he is getting something better than usual when he gets the best of five reels, and he can recognize the sense of the argument that his continued patronage helps him to get a better performance.

Beat the Stores.

In a recent issue there was advertised the fashion reels of the New York Fax Film Company. The films (three reels of which are to be issued twice each year) are intended primarily for the dry goods and department stores, but they may be had by photoplay theaters, and as but one display is made in each town it really is an exclusive. It consists in the greater part of the styles shown at the New York Fashion Show, where the store buyers are given an opportunity to see the winter styles in midsummer and the summer styles in mid-winter. The winter styles issue shows 107 styles, from Paris, New York and Philadelphia, and forty slides in addition, which serve to break the change in reels. The slides are accompanied by a descriptive lecture. The price is $25 a day, with a minimum of three days' use.

As a special matinee attraction or for morning matinees, either with or without the collaboration of the leading store or stores, the scheme seems decidedly attractive. Fashions will pull the feminine clientele as nothing else will and the distribution of tickets may be worked in a variety of ways, either as a straight admission proposition, at a larger price with a coupon good for an evening of the regular bill (when most of the tickets will bring other money for escorts), or as an advertising scheme for the stores, which will purchase tickets in blocks, in which case care must be exercised that the distribution of tickets does not exceed the capacity of the house. There are other angles to the scheme, but the hints given should suggest the other workings.

Coming Soon.

Old-timers will welcome the Edison announcement that "Why Girls Leave Home" is shortly to be released in two reels and in the modern style of production. The comedy in its one-reel form was one of the most genuinely funny stories ever produced on film. It should be even better in two parts. Those who recall the old release and then remember how much improvement in travesty work was shown in "Stuff That Dreams Are Made Of," will look eagerly forward to the coming two-part story.

Just Remember.

Just remember that the two and three part story is going to be the attraction of the future. If you do not run them now, are you reading up on them against the time you'll need the information? Some day you will need to know the stories. Mark down the data now, even if you are still clinging to the one-reel stuff. Two and three part stories need more booming because they can stand more.

Cameraphone Please Note.

Will the publisher of the Cameraphone Bulletins please note that our name has slipped off the exchange list? We will appreciate it if the name is put back with a little rosin on it so it will not slip again.

Real Schools.

WE are indebted to Miss Maibelle Heikes Justice for a letter written her by Mrs. Gowin of the Hartford (Conn.) High School. Mrs. Gowin, who did not know that Miss Hettie Gray Baker, another Selig star, was a resident of Hartford, wrote Miss Justice We append the two letters:

> In sorting out my mail today I came across this letter. I am sending it to you as it might be of moment to your readers to note the interest taken in the high schools of these two cities, in moving pictures, in that they ask such information as would enable them to advocate scenario writing to their students as a vocation. It seems to me to be a very bright idea on the part of Mrs. Gowin, and I am sure it gave me pleasure to extend to her all the information in my power for the benefit of the high school pupils. But the main point I held to, of course, was that the scenario writer must have a natural bent for the work, the gift of imagination and the power to construct dramatically, all of which can be strengthened by experience, but cannot be "made," in any one, as the successful photoplaywright is born to the gift the same as the sculptor is to his. I believe that Connecticut is the first state to promulgate this idea, and it occurs to me as an excellently good one for others to follow. What do you think of it?

Mrs. Gowin writes:

> Your work interests me very much in connection with a study I am making of vocations for girls. Our high school girls know very little about how to earn their living, and it seems to me that there is nothing that would guide and encourage them more than accounts of what successful women already have done. I am enclosing a blank which is being sent to a few women in each vocation and shall appreciate very much your giving the girls the benefit of your practical experience by answering any of these questions. The blank has been brief so that it can be filled out easily, but any other information which you think girls ought to know about your vocation may be added.
> I may explain that I am reorganizing our high school course in vocational information in connection with Superintendent Wheatley, of the Middletown City Schools, and that the information sent us will be used by the school girls in both cities.

The Value of Technique.

Now and then we get irritated with a certain writer, who declares technique to be of no value. It would be all right if he did not preach as well as practice this gospel, but he is leading astray those who follow him because of his remarkable successes with Biograph, Reliance and others.

He has a wonderful fertile mind. He can take an order in the morning and deliver a really good story three or four hours later and he has written some of the really great Biograph stories, which is equivalent to saying that he has written some of the best stories going.

In a word he sells ideas, and because the ideas are good he is well paid for them, but he does not equal some of the other star writers precisely because he does deliver the story in the rough. The rough diamond brings but little money in comparison with the finished product of the cutter, and the same holds good in every line of business. The raw material does not equal in price the finished product. Bannister Merwin does not get the top price for a few sheets of paper on which the idea is merely suggested. Every minute action that contributes to the development of the story is set forth in detail. His scripts are almost too full for the average director, but there is no chance of a misunderstanding.

We do not hold that technique is the end of all; indeed, technique is no more than the means to an end; but technique is as necessary to the successful writer as to the novice, and the author who sends in his material in exact and proper form will always be paid more money than the man who merely sketches out the idea and leaves the rest to the director for elaboration.

Technique cannot make your poor idea good, but technique does enable you to display a good idea to the very best advantage and bring you more than would be paid for idea alone. You pay five cents a pound for soda crackers out of a barrel and five cents for about half a pound in a package that brings them to you crisp and fresh, without dirt and with the assurance that they have not been handled more than is absolutely necessary. Any grocer or druggist will tell you that "package goods" are in greater demand than "bulk goods," and technique is merely the package in which the idea is put up.

Technique alone will seldom sell. Idea alone will sell. Idea plus technique will sell for more than idea alone and sometimes more than double the price. Do not think that you can replace idea with technique, but having the idea and technique as well, you can get more for the idea than a careless presentation of idea will bring.

Kinked History.

A magazine appealing to the public end of the photoplay with a playwriting attachment notes among the "new" writers Roy McCardell, William H. Kitchell, Emmett Campbell Hall and others. As this department stated a long time since, Roy McCardell was the first salaried editor and photoplaywright in the United States, having worked for the Biograph twelve or fourteen years ago. William H. Kitchell and Emmett Campbell Hall were both writing good script four or five years ago.

Further on it states that between "Wright, Sargent, Hennessy, McCardell and Jones, and Miss Justice and Miss Gene Gauntier, there has been filmed, perhaps, about 150 plays during the past year." The first four alone have each sold in excess of fifty scripts the past year and most of the scores are closer to the hundred mark. Miss Gauntier, we believe, has not written much the past year, but she has written as many as 200 in twelve months. It looks as though facts and figures stood in some need of revision.

If You Live in Denver.

If you live in Denver and want to foregather with your fellow writers, send a stamped and addressed envelope and you will be put in touch with the organizer of a Circle of the Inquest Club.

If You Live in Baltimore.

If you live in Baltimore and want to join a circle now forming, send a stamped and addressed envelope.

Correcting Scripts.

The Rev. Sydney Booth offers an excellent suggestion to the painstaking. After he has written a story he corrects the carbon copy. After an interval he corrects the original copy, then he compares the two. Often he finds corrections on one sheet that do not appear on the other.

The value of this idea over the double reading of one script is this: You are apt to think the first reading sufficient and the second reading is perfunctory, but reading each time from a fresh sheet, there are no previous corrections and so the mind is kept more alert.

No Punctures.

Authors who have lately had scripts returned by the Vitagraph have complained that the sheets are perforated by pin holes. At the request of some of the victims, the matter has been taken up with Mr. J. Stuart Blackton, who advises that pins will not be used in future, so send your stuff in with no fear of mutilation.

The defacement of the property of another is unwarrantable and inexcusable, but it is always—as in this case—the result of ignorance and incompetence on the part of some employee and not a deliberate and intentional injury as some of the complainants have hinted.

Writing for Special Needs.

We have always preached the folly of trying to write scripts to fit the special needs of some particular studio, but the other day this was driven home by an order for a three-reel story for immediate production. When we realized the number of questions we had to ask as to production conditions in order that the story might be intelligently done, we also realized that it would be foolish in the extreme to try and write such stuff without being able to get complete information at first hand.

It pays best to write the story that is generally available, leaving the special demands to those who can ascertain just what is wanted.

Not Vindictive.

The other day an author who has been selling of late turned out a script that was rejected by everyone. It was off the beaten track and he decided that perhaps it was not what was wanted. He writes to ask if the submission of this story has possibly hurt him with the studios.

We do not think that the fact that he was too original is going to hurt him. He struck out on a line that is followed only occasionally by two companies, but while he has no market, a script that is sanely original will never hurt the reputation of the writer, even though other conditions may prevent acceptance and production. It is the constant submission of obviously inferior scripts that hurts an author with the editors and even then they are not vindictive.

New Orleans Hints.

Julian Louis Lamothe, of the New Orleans Inquest Club, reports that W. E. Gipson suggests that the club members add the cast of scenes in the margin of the script, the names of all persons required in each scene being written in the margin. We know several authors who follow this practice, but it is scarcely necessary where each scene is brief and clearly indicates the persons to be employed. If each scene covered a page or more, this would be helpful, but where a scene should not run more than twelve or fourteen lines at the most the marginal cast by scenes is scarcely necessary.

Mr. Lamothe also writes that he is selling some of the stuff that he retired. He says: "Of course I am changing them all kinds of ways. City dramas are becoming western thrillers, my once most morbid drama is now a farce and there are other changes along the same lines." That's the real way to sell stories. Because you originally write a story as a drama it does not necessarily follow that the idea would not better lend itself to farcical treatment. No author who can see but one aspect of an idea will ever gain lasting success. Plots are protean.

The Lubin Script.

(Concluded from last week)

38—In the Pullman.
Nell on pins and needles. Maurice don't know what to make of it.

39—In the Baggage Car.
The fight.

40—Open Country.
Train going along.

41—In the Baggage Car.
The fight. Baggage man makes a jump to reach bell rope but Billy wings him. Baggage man drops. Billy comes forward cautiously.

42—In the Pullman.
Maurice wondering at Nell's nervousness. She tells him she's all right.

43—In the Baggage Car.
Billy has Maurice's trunk open, pulls Nell's over, lifts jewelry from Maurice's trunk and dumps it into Nell's. (The baggage man is lying near camera.)

44—Open Country.

45—In the Baggage Car
Billy pulling overalls off baggageman.

46—Exterior Valley Springs Station.
Watson in auto, looking at watch and waiting for train.

47—In the Baggage Car.
Billy in baggageman's overalls has Nell's trunk near door and is waiting for train to reach Valley Springs.

48—In the Pullman.
Porter tells Nell, "Valley Springs, etc." Preparations to leave train.

50—In the Baggage Car.
Billy at the door. Baggageman begins to regain consciousness, but Billy does not notice. Billy begins to open door.

51—Exterior Valley Springs Station.
Watson waiting in auto, train pulls in, baggage car stops so as to take in view auto and pullman car up platform from which Nell enters assisted by Maurice, who bids her goodbye and then gets on steps of car and waves. Nell come down platform towards camera. Station baggageman is pulling truck down to baggage car. Billy throws Nell's trunk on truck.

52—In the Baggage Car
Billy at door handing out Nell's trunk. Baggageman slowly rising to his feet unseen by Billy, springs at Billy.

53—Exterior Station.
Nell gives trunk check to station baggageman, asks him to throw her trunk on Watson's auto. He does so. Nell hurriedly gets into auto. Watson prepares to drive off. Just then baggageman in car springs on Billy and cries out. Station man sees Billy jump from car to platform, knocks down station man and jumps into Watson's auto which speeds away.
Leader—Billy had planned to change clothes and slip off at the next station, but——

54—Station (Same as 53.)
Wild excitement, station man jumps into baggage car and pulls out Maurice's trunk, which is open and rifled. Maurice comes running and discovers also. Policemen and crowd gather, excited, orders, all run off.

55—Village Street.
Auto containing Watson, Billy, Nell and the trunk speeding away.

56—Flash—Station.
Maurice, policeman and detectives jump into an auto and speed away.

57—Flash. Interior Telegraph Office.
Operator looking out window, station attache rushes in, tells of robbery, etc. Operator gets busy at instrument.

58—Road.
Watson's auto speeding. Watson driving. Billy looking back. Nell sits stoney-eyed.

59—Road.
Maurice's auto speeding, all looking ahead.

60—Road.
Showing the two autos in race, shots from each car.

61—Road.
In Watson's auto, Billy firing.

62—Road.
The two autos speeding.

63—Interior. Bridge Tender's Little Office.
Bridge tender reading, phone rings, bridge tender answers, gets excited, bangs up phone and rushes out.

64—Drawbridge Showing Apparatus that Opens Bridge.
Bridge tender rushes on and starts to open bridge.

65—Road with Bridge in Distance.
The two autos speeding.

66—Road at End of Bridge.
Put camera on bridge and show bridge opening with autos coming in distance.

67—View of Road and Open Bridge from the Water.
Watson's auto (with dummies) on and plunges into river. Maurice's auto stops on brink.

68—Road at Open Bridge.
Maurice and man out of auto look down at river, horrified.

69—Close View of Water.
Nell and Billy struggling in water.

70—Back to 68. Road.
Maurice sees Nell struggling in water, pulls off coat and dives to the rescue.

71—Back to 69 (In the Water).
Maurice lands in water and swims to Nell's rescue. Motorboat on and two men in boat rescue Maurice, Nell and Billy. Boat chugs away.

72—Slip or any kind of Boat Landing.
Motorboat lands. Nell and Billy lifted out and laid on ground. Billy tells Maurice that Nell was forced into the scheme, etc. Police want Nell (who is unconscious), but Maurice interferes. Billy dies, Maurice orders Nell carried off.
Leader—Later.

73—Private Room in Hospital.
Nell in bed. Nurse giving her medicine. Physician saying she is out of danger, physician exits. Maurice enters, goes to Nell, she hides her face, Maurice tells her he knows all, she asks forgiveness. Maurice takes ring from pocket and puts in on her finger. She can't believe she's awake. They go to a clinch.

Inquiries.

NOTE—No questions can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. A list of addresses to which photoplays may be sent will be mailed on receipt of a STAMPED AND ADDRESSED ENVELOPE No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of a script.

RUBEENA.—How does it happen you let a whole week pass without a single letter, and only two this week? And then you speak of having met a young man Are you going back on your bald headed Answers Man? Don't talk about "your play." Talk about your plays. One play never made an author. Write and keep on writing if you would learn how. Miss Pickford's matrimonial affairs are none of our concern Don't know where Jack Halliday is. Hobart Bosworth left Selig to produce the Jack London pictures. We think that Mr. Foote has left the Vitagraph.

A. M L.—There is no connection between the Mutual and the Universal, nor has either company taken one brand from the other camp, but the players are passing from one to the other so constantly that this may have given rise to your suspicion.

B. B.—We reply to the inquiries that come in, but we do not write fake questions to fill a page and we know what the boss would say to us if we did. Miss Turner's pictures will be independent releases, when they come along. We cannot forecast the casting of plays by any company. Write Mr Johnson direct. We know of no really good photographs on sale. We cannot place Miss Gibson with any company at the moment.

R. W.—We find nothing objectionable in the article you send. It follows our own opinion.

E. D.—Give Edison eight weeks, at least. They read slowly, but with care.

C. B. J.—Thanks for your personal letter. The effect you describe is a panoram, which is both a noun and a verb, that is you panoram to get a panoram. To panoram a short distance the camera is revolved upon a turntable in the tripod head. For longer distances it is mounted on some vehicle. It should be employed only where necessary.

W. E. M.—The studio is reading with unusual slowness at the moment. We think we would let it lie a couple of weeks longer, at least

B. B.—Arthur Johnson has not played in his last picture yet. We cannot, off hand, mention some recent releases because our cards are not catalogued that way.

G. A. C.—The company was not very polite, but on the other hand it probably has grown tired of explaining that it is perfectly competent to make its own adaptations when it wants them. They make few, if any, releases of their own at best. If you follow all sorts of market hints you'll constantly get up against misinformation of this sort

J. A.—A copyright on a magazine covers all the original contents. A special copyright line over a story in that magazine means that that particular story has been copyrighted as a contribution to the publication by separate copyright entry. You waste your time if you try to be an author without being able to think up plots for yourself.

C. D. A.—Your identification is too vague to enable us to locate the release.

ROANOKE.—Sign your name after this, please. No chance for a circle in your city and it will not pay you to go to Washington. What would you expect us to reply in answer to your last question?

K. B.—Try K-B or Western Universal.

WOULD-BE.—You had the right Keystone address. Try Eclair. There is no reliable market dope. Real information is given in this department, when there is any. Lubin is buying, but wants only the best.

E. S.—The player was an extra. The Biograph Identifier is digging up the information for you.

J. H. F.—Bud Duncan, now with Fred Mace in Apollo films, is the player whose identification you ask. The second player is D. Morris, who the Biograph Identifier thinks is Daniel Morris, late of Moon and Morris, who were with the New York Winter Garden show. (Anybody know for sure?). Mr. Barr was with the Majestic, but we do not know if he is still with them, as the comedy end was broken up when Fred Mace was transferred to New Rochelle.

Operators' Union Directory, I. A. T. S. E.

NOTICE: Each union is entitled to have its roster of officers, meeting nights, etc., listed here once per year, free of cost Preserve this list, as it will not be republished. The mail address of the secretary should be included, and the address of the regular meeting place, if any.

Local No. 281, Paducah, Kentucky.

Charles H. Hunt, president; H. E. Meyers, vice-president; Guy Barnett, secretary; Charles Bryan, treasurer; Raymon Thompson, sergeant at-arms.

Question No. 2.

How and by what means is electric energy generated in a dynamo?

A complete answer to this question will involve several things, so do a little digging before you reply. To give you a hint of what I mean: It is not sufficient to say "lines of force." You must understand where these lines of force come from, what they are, and what is meant by their density, etc., etc., etc., You must either possess real knowledge of the subject or else dig around and get it to answer these questions, so, unless you are willing to study you might as well not answer. But if you are a real "live wire," get busy and come along with us.

Employes and Employes.

Often I have seen two men enter employment at the same time, each one having equal opportunities, but one forged ahead, securing increased salary and increased responsibility, while the other remained stationary, doing the same old minor work in the same old minor way. The first named, as a rule, did more studying than talking. The second had a tale to tell to all who would listen and that tale bore the burden of hard "luck." He would stop his work at any time and expound to a listener concerning his hard lot in life, pointing out, in proof, the advanced condition of the other fellow, citing it as an example of what "luck" (good) will do for a man.

As a matter of fact, however, luck has, and had nothing to do with the matter at all. The man who got ahead took an interest in his work, studied it in all its details and became master of it. Ridiculous as it may seem, he actually took more interest in what he was employed to do than in the baseball score, or other equally vital matters. He was not satisfied in doing a thing in a certain way just because his predecessor had done it in exactly that way, but studied out new and improved methods of performing his duties, and thus increased the efficiency of his hand and brain. All of which was, in the course of time, noted by his employer, and when the time came the result of his course showed in the pay envelope, as well as in advancement in the service. The other chap was, however, a believer in "let well enough alone." If the man before him had performed a certain duty in a bungling, inefficient manner, he could see no earthly reason why that method should be changed by him. If the boss wanted it changed, why let him say so. He was paid to perform certain duties and he was performing them—after a fashion—so "he should worry." He took an exceedingly lively interest in the baseball scores, and could give you pointers on who was the best prize fighter, but ask him concerning the latest and most approved methods of performing his daily task and he would look at you with a vacant stare. In the course of time the first man became president of the concern, and rode in his own gasoline buggy. In the course of time the second man either had not moved at all, or had lost his position, because he not only did not keep in the fore front of the procession, but even lagged behind its tail end. "Luck was against him," and at the end of years of hard labor all he had to show was a pair of calloused hands and a tale of woe.

Literally in thousands of operating rooms in this country we have men of the type of the second individual—the one who never got ahead; the one who did not have any luck at all; the one who only got an increase in salary when it was forced by an organization, because he was really not worth what he was getting, let alone an increase. Right here in the city of New York, where the top union scale is $25, I know of a few operators who are getting $35 and $40—why? The answer is very simple. They are worth the money. If the union scale was $40, and it was enforced, these men would be getting $60, because, by comparison, they would be worth it. There are, however, mighty few of the $40 article in New York—mighty few indeed. There is a crying need for him, not only in New York, but all over the eastern country. The operator who will enter the profession determined to let no chance escape him of learning the technicalities of his business, and who will pay close and constant attention to the details of his profession, has a future before him. I do not know of any other wage-earning profession which offers better inducement, from a financial point of view, than moving picture operating, provided the course suggested be followed. Finer theaters, involving a larger investment, are rapidly coming into vogue. The tendency will be toward increase in price of admission, and all this is, of course, going to bring about an increased demand for really high class projection. Are you one of the men who can and will produce that article? You must remember, however, in answering that question, that really high class projection calls for very, very close attention on the part of the operator, as well as an expert knowledge of a good many things. The actual labor of operating is being made somewhat easier in that motor drives are coming more and more into use. But the work is becoming more exacting in other directions. A certain exhibitor, who is acknowledged as putting on the finest traveling show in this country, wanted operators recently. He was willing to pay $40 a week and expenses. He actually came very near having to close one of his shows, because he could not secure operators able to do his class of work. He expended over $300 in railroad fares in having men come to his headquarters, and not one of them was able to make good. He came to New York and was unable to secure men here; he came to the editor of this department, and I was unable to cite him the class of men he wanted, for the simple reason that men who could fill his requirements were already receiving $40 a week, or very close to that sum. All of which shows that there is plenty of room at the top in moving picture operating, though they are hanging to the bottom of the ladder in huge bunches.

Operator Has Bad Fire.

From a member of Local 160, Cleveland, Ohio, comes the following:

> Just a few lines to let you know what is doing in Cleveland, and to get acquainted with you. Am sending clipping from the Cleveland Leader, which you might want to use in the department. Attached also find a card which I cut from the band around a reel of films. One operator wants to get a big name for himself for he stamps it on all the posters, reel bands, and everything he can get it on. He is a joke to all the Cleveland boys. I have been running two Power's Six machines for a year and a half and have had no trouble. The men of Local 160 are all O. K., but one of our most active operators, Mr. J. W. Kenjockety, had a very bad fire recently. He went to bed smoking a pipe, and while he went to sleep the pipe didn't—result a badly burned hand, and a bed that won't be slept on any more. Brother Kenjockety did not know how to burn up a reel of film, but he knows how to burn up his bed all right. By the way, Brother Burn-Up-His-Bed is a full-blood Seneca Indian. If there is another such in the country let us hear from him, as we think we have the only one there is.

Too bad, too bad. Would suggest that Brother Kenjockety put fire shutters on his bedroom, held up by a safety cord and fuse link; also he might get a metal box in which to put his clothes when he goes to bed. However, I expect it is dangerous talking about this particular operator in this particular way, since he is liable to don his war paint, put on a feathered bonnet and come down here after our topknot. As to the operator who stamps his name on reel bands, well, it might be a case of exaggerated ego, or it might be a case of a very sensible man who has absorbed the idea that advertising pays. I can conceive that if I was a manager and wanted an operator, I might remember having seen this man's name on a reel band, and might be inclined to try him out, since he has, at least, done something out of the ordinary in stamping his name on reel bands. There may be quite some method in this man's apparent madness, and as long as the idea is original he should not be crowded out by any imitators. As to the clipping, this department is composed entirely of first-hand matter, and, though the item is an excellent one, I could not use it. Many thanks for its submission nevertheless.

Severy, Kansas, Answered.

Alliance, Ohio, suggests the following concerning the troubles of Severy, Kan. He writes:

> On page 958, August 30th issue, I notice Mr. A. F. Redmond, Severy, Kan., is having trouble with a double spot. I believe this is caused by top carbon too far ahead of the lower one. Bottom carbon too far back from the top one. We had a big time here September 1st—Labor Day. A picture was taken of our float, one of which will be sent for publication in the near future. We took second prize that day. Well, I guess this is all, and trust I will be welcome to the department again in the future.

You certainly will be. Alliance draws a sketch explaining his idea of Severy's trouble, but I hardly think it is worth while to reproduce it. His view is that the front carbon is advanced too much, thus causing the light from both craters to reach the lens, instead of from the upper crater only, in which he may be, and quite possibly, is correct. We shall be glad to have the picture you mention. Send it along.

You Could Not.

Mr. Bert D. Stephens, proprietor and manager of Stephens' Opera House, Nicholson, Pa., wants to know if he can project a satisfactory 12 foot picture on a 30 foot throw with a drop of approximately 5 feet.

No, Brother Stephens, you could not, if by "satisfactory" you mean good. The throw is too short. You would have to have about 2⅓ inch c. f. lens and, while you can get that kind of an article all right, such a lens is not at all likely to give you a satisfactory picture. In fact, I have yet to see one of those very short focal length lenses produce satisfactory results. The picture usually is hazy at the edges and sharp only in the center. Another thing: it is very difficult to get satisfactory results with that kind of a lens when using a projector with an outside shutter. You cannot get the shutter close enough to the lens. The light rays will spread too much before they reach the shutter blade, and you will find it necessary to have an extra wide blade, which very greatly accentuates the flicker. To produce a 12-foot picture you should have at the very least calculation a 45-foot throw, and 50 or 60 would be better. But if you are determined to tackle that proposition, I advise you to use an inside shutter machine.

Resistance For Road Shows.

Mr. John S. Grimes, of St. Louis, Mo., says he is figuring on touring Arkansas and the Southern States with a road show, and wants to know what he shall take along in the way of resistance.

This is a question that has been asked quite a number of times. Perhaps a somewhat extended discussion will not be out of place, particularly in view of the fact that just now there is considerable tendency to the establishment of traveling photoplay shows, making a circuit of small towns.

There are several things to be considered in this connection, but first and foremost, whatever type of resistance is taken it should be mechanically well constructed, so as to withstand rough usage without liability to damage; also it should be light, since heavy apparatus is not only difficult to handle, but is also more apt to get broken in transit.

The traveling exhibitor is likely to encounter both a. c. and d. c. ranging in voltage from 104 to 250, or even, in some instances, 500, though he should not figure on carrying resistance to take care of the latter. The best resistance for the road man, according to my way of thinking, is some type of rheostat which is divided into two or more separate sections, in such a way that when both or all the sections are connected in series it will deliver approximately 25 amperes on 250 volt pressure. If two such resistances be carried, as should be the case, then the operator can get 50 amperes from 250 volts, or, by making the proper connections between the different sections, he can get almost anything he wants from 110 volts, and can even get ample current from 70 volt pressure by connecting the sections in multiple with each other. The best rheostat I have ever seen for road work was one put out by the Chicago Stage Lighting Company a number of years ago, though I do not know whether or not it is still to be had. This rheostat consisted of a number of sections, each one a separate and complete rheostat, in a single case, with the binding posts all on the upper side where they were easily gotten at. Each one of these sections, if I remember rightly, was supposed to deliver 12½ amperes on 110 volts, and, in their largest rheostat, known as the "Jumbo," there were, I think, six or seven sections. This rheostat was strong, very compact and light, and, as will be readily seen, the operator could get almost any desired amperage out of it. The next best road resistance, to my way of thinking, is Power's Circular 240 Volt Rheostat. This device is strong and is mechanically very well made, and is remarkably light; also it is adjustable. It can be used on voltage up to 250 and its two halves can be used in multiple on 110 volts, which gives it a very wide range of usefulness. Its amperage delivery on the various contacts was fully set forth on page 807, May 24, 1913, issue. The Enterprise Optical Company also puts out, or did put out, a rheostat which is excellent for road work. It is illustrated in figure 61, page 132, of the Handbook. It consists of two complete rheostats in one case. It is light and will stand considerable rough usage.

It is, of course, impracticable for the road man to carry a transformer, since these devices are very heavy, and, moreover, can only be used on the voltage and cycle of current for which each individual instrument is built. Rectifiers are entirely out of the question for road work. In fact, the only practical thing for the road man is the rheostat.

The road man meets with a great many amusing experiences, and in the old days, frequently was obliged to exercise a great deal of ingenuity. I well remember a yarn spun by an operator who visited me a year or two ago. He was an old timer and I guess what he told me was straight, all right enough. It seems he was with a traveling show, playing the small towns down in Texas several years ago. In some way his rheostat got carried by. The baggage or expressman failed to unload it, and he arrived in a small village, where they were to show in a church, at 7 p.m., without any resistance at all. The little one-horse light plant was heavily overloaded, and its superintendent would not listen to the use of water resistance, so Mr. Operator hunted up the hardware man, only to discover that there was not a bit of wire in his stock which could be used for such a purpose. Our friend then began to scratch his head to stir up ideas. He was up against it right, but solved the difficulty when his gaze lit on the strands of a barbed wire fence surrounding the church. He examined the fence and the posts were perfectly dry. He had a lot of number 6 copper wire with him and connected one end of it to the top strand of the wire and the other end to the lamp; line voltage 110. Then he went along the fence for some distance and connected one end of another copper wire to the top strand and the other end of this wire to the switch. He tried it out and blew a 30-ampere fuse. He then moved his fence connection away apart and everything was lovely. Next he got some paper and printed a couple of dozen "danger" signs and pinned them along the wire and hired two men to patrol the fence so nobody would touch it. He gave his show, all right, but along towards the end the superintendent of the light plant came in and asked what he was using for resistance. The operator would not tell him, whereupon Mr. Super followed the wires out to the fence and returned, foaming at the mouth. The operator, who was running the last few feet of the show, grinned at him, and said go pull it loose, if you don't like it, which the superintendent promptly did, just as the operator reached for the switch to pull his light. The show was over.

I wonder how many licensed operators of to-day would have been able to pull off that kind of a stunt. Of course, if the ground had been wet and the posts damp, it might not have worked, but in dry weather those posts would insulate 110 volts perfectly and the only danger lay in somebody touching the wire and getting a heavy shock, which same he guarded against by the patrol and danger signs. Yes, indeed, the life of the road operator, in the early stages of moving pictures, was one merry round of excitement. He was very frequently called upon to make bricks without straw. He did not tell the king he could not do it either, but just looked around and found a substitute for the straw, put it in, and also "put it over."

Editor a Motorcycle Bug.

Across 3,000 miles of hill and vale I shake the fists of Frisco's operator motorcycle bugs. I'm one myself now. Have a Harley-Davidson twin that can climb a tree and run circles around any $4,000 gasoline buggy in New York City. Haven't mussed up the scenery with my remains yet, but if the Projection Department comes out with a lot of kind words and a nice wide black border some of these days you may know that motorcycle has gone wrong.

A Historic Relic.

Through the kindness of Mr. George Hedden, of the Vitagraph Company, I am enabled to present herewith a photograph of the first set of slides ever used to illustrate a song. Old-timers will remember these round, wood-bound, colored slides which cost us a $1.50 each in the old days. The particular slide shown is that of Washington crossing the Delaware. Tony Pastor, some time deceased, conceived the idea, a good many years ago, of illustrating songs by stereopticon pictures. He selected a patriotic song, the name of which is not now known, and, going down to McAllister, the pioneer New York slide man's place, selected from stock slides such scenes as he thought would fit in with the text of the song, and it is one of the slides thus selected which we present herewith. Mr. Pastor sang the song himself, in his own theater. Shortly before he died he gave these slides to Mr. Hedden, a close personal friend, as a relic, and the entire original set is now in Mr. Hedden's possession. It is indeed an interesting keepsake, and one which Mr. Hedden values very highly.

Interior Directions—Ideas Wanted.

Texas, who requests that, for business reasons, his name or location be not given, writes as follows:

> I would be obliged if you will give some information through the department concerning wall and ceiling coloring of rooms and theaters used for moving picture projection, advising which colors are most favorable for the purpose.

Well, Texas, that is a rather good sized contract. In fact, it is a larger one that I would care to tackle off hand. However, you have opened up a lead which can be followed into a well-defined vein of exceedingly useful information. And I would cordially invite theater managers, or operators, who have a color scheme which is giving satisfaction to describe the same in the department. I would also be glad to have views and ideas of different ones on this important subject. Since this particular matter was last discussed in the department big changes have come about, and whereas at that time the darker we could get the interior of a theater, while pictures were running, the better. Nowadays the demand is for light theaters—as light as they can be had without materially injuring the projection. Then, too, indirect lighting systems have brought about a decided change in interior wall and ceiling coloring. I shall be glad to have the experience of managers, or operators, who are using indirect lighting systems, as to the color effects best suited to that system. Of course, one general statement can be made which will hold good in any event, and that is that whatever color scheme is used the various tints must be complementary to each other—must harmonize perfectly.

Now, gentlemen, let us have your views on this very important subject. I am willing to give any reasonable amount of space to it for the next few weeks, for it is a matter of considerable moment, from several points of view.

Guil Pastiles Address.

Inquiries are still coming in for the address of the importer of Guil Pastiles. This address will be found in the classified Adv. column, P. 1327, September 20th issue.

A Friend in Far Off Lands.

For the past three months the Kinematograph & Lantern Weekly, of London, England's moving picture publication, has been running a series of articles on projection, occupying two pages of each issue, written by the editor of this department. The aforesaid paper said some very kind things about the writer of the articles, and named him as America's foremost authority on projection. This was indeed very flattering, but, as might have been expected, it brought about one effect, viz.: a few of the British men, thinking, no doubt, that it would be quite a feather in their caps to be able to pick flaws in the work of an American writer, proceeded to get busy and criticise. These criticisms, for the most part, had very little foundation. However, I have just received a copy of a letter, and a red hot one, too, written the Kinematograph Weekly by a theater manager, and operator, in far off China. The writer, who, by the way, is a British subject, defends your humble servant in no weak terms.

I mention this circumstance because my friend and champion, who is the manager of the Arcade Amusement Company, Tientsin, China, suggests that I also publish his letter in the Projection Department. This, I think, would be hardly right; nor would there be any object in it. I believe the Kinematograph Weekly did only right in publishing some of the criticisms. I replied to one of them by merely saying that the one who simply sought to pick flaws could do so in the writings of any man, but that it was far easier to criticise than to create. The Kinematograph Weekly has treated me with great kindness. It is something of an achievement to have a man in China defend an American writer against critics in England.

From Kansas City.

One signing himself "An Operator," followed in parenthesis by "Name won by ten years' service and not from ten days in an auto school," contributes the following:

> Taking notice of your recent call for comment regarding the publication of the contemplated list of questions and answers to same in your columns for the purpose of further educating "employed operators" has prompted the sending of the clipping herewith enclosed. Now here is a point that can scarcely be viewed but in one manner and that is that the list of questions would be used by such people as these to gain knowledge enough to teach others that managers are begging to hire. This advertisement originates from an automobile training school, so you can readily guess the rest. I am as enthusiastic as anyone concerning the questions, yet at the same time I believe that they would tend in numerous cases to work hardships on many competent operators. To further my argument in the matter will state that I am almost positive that the beginning of this school grew from pointers taken from the projection department. You understand the spirit of this letter and it's intentions and will of course act accordingly in accepting the information it contains. In conclusion, it might be of interest to you to know that the recent contracts of Local No. 170 have met with favorable results, although calling for a 25 per cent. raise of the wage scale in this city.

I have given this letter space as setting forth the opposition side of the argument, though as far as the schools are concerned, I do not believe they cut much figure, one way or the other. I am, however, willing to agree that the publication of a series of questions and the answers thereto might not be altogether beneficial, but Kansas City has not suggested any method of getting around the injurious part of the proposition. Let him come out with a suggestion as to how this scheme can be worked, so that it will only benefit genuine working operators, and not the public at large. The advertisement he cites is the usual type of advertising matter put out by operators' schools. It is ridiculous on the face of it. It starts off: "Good money; work evenings; make $15 to $30 a week, and hold your old job." etc., all of which is so absurd as to very largely defeat its own end.

A Suggestion.

Mr. Arthur Ayers, operator of the Cozy Picture Parlor, Bellefontaine, Ohio, orders a Handbook for his assistant, and makes the following suggestion to the Enterprise Optical Company.

> I would like to suggest that the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company place two off-set hubs on their upper and lower sprockets, so that they may be turned end for end. You have suggested, in the Handbook, that the upper sprocket be put below and the lower above, since they resolve in opposite directions. The upper and lower sprockets of the Motiograph do not, however, revolve in opposite directions, therefore, I cannot see the advantage in the suggestion as applied to that mechanism, except that the lower sprocket receives considerable more wear than the upper, and the change would put the better sprocket where the heaviest strain was. I work in a pretty little theater that seats 258. Our screen is located at the front of the house, and is a plaster wall, which is, in my estimation, the best projection surface to be had. The operating room is eight feet square by seven feet high. It has two windows, one door, and a vent pipe about twenty inches in diameter through the roof to the open air. Its side walls, back wall, and roof are of reinforced concrete, with an eight-inch brick wall in front. The theater has done excellent business since opening two weeks ago, and all our patrons seem to be very well pleased. The managers, Messrs. F. E. and W. S. Kutter, understand their business. They have two theaters and the class of people who patronize the houses is evidence that they are real managers. I said they had two theaters. This is not exactly right; they own the "Cozy" and have the picture privilege in the Grand Opera House. We try to put on good projection, not some of the time, but all the time, though the light plant here is overloaded and voltage frequently gets pretty low, which makes it difficult to deliver results. I have your Handbooks, both the new and the old, and would not part with either one. They are both fine, particularly the latter. I study the Department, and could scarcely get along without it.
> I wish you would give us a little description of Kinemacolor, if it is possible, showing pictures of their projection machine, etc., thus giving the small town operators an idea of what it is like.

My congratulations, Brother Ayers, to you as a man who is trying to produce results, and who is going about it in the right way. As to the sprocket matter, there is very little wear on an upper sprocket of any machine; in fact, almost none at all, while the take-up pull is against the teeth of the lower sprocket, therefore, the changing of these sprockets accomplishes almost the same purpose as turning them around. Your operating room description sounds good, though I do not just see why you use brick for the front wall. There is no objection to it, of course, but I should suppose you might as well have made the whole thing of concrete, while you were about it. You are correct in saying that plaster is one of the best projection surfaces there is, but it requires a much heavier amperage to produce a given brilliancy when using that kind of a screen than when using one of the modern semi-reflecting type. I am preparing Kinemacolor matter as per your suggestion.

Richardson, editor Projection Department of the Moving Picture World, and Mr. H. J. Kearney, who was chairman of the entertainment committee of Local 150 to entertain the editor.

Polarity Indicator.

Mr. Joseph S. Pare, New York City, says:

> I have found a very handy and simple polarity indicator, which is small and compact, being three inches in length by one-half inch in diameter. It is made of hard rubber, with glass vial inside and the whole protected with a solid aluminum shell, gives instantaneous reading and can be used on any voltage from 50 to 600. The article retails for $1.50, but I have bought a box of 200, and will send one to any operator by parcel post for $1.10 while they last.

Mr. Pare's address is 139 West 64th Street, New York City. Such a device would be very convenient to a traveling operator, and, if it is indestructible—that is to say, will last indefinitely—it would be a convenience to any operator, though such things are not used very often, and, for that reason, probably few operators would care to invest much money. Where a tool is used to any considerable extent, I always advise an operator to get it, since it is a necessity, but where it is a device which is only used once in a great while, it is up to the man whether he wishes to invest money in what amounts to a luxury. When an operator can himself construct a device it not only supplies instruction and amusement, but he gets the tool practically for nothing as well.

He Got Caught.

Mr. Harry W. Seward, Reading, Pa., writes thusly:

> A few lines to let the boys know that the "swindler" (Page 1172, Sept. 13th issue) got caught. He came to this city and started his little graft, cleaned up a few dollars on the outskirts, and then began on Main Street, where he "got his." He saw two of the boys, spun his little yarn, and sprung the old back number magazine. The thing looked fishy and they stalled him off. He tried to see the writer several times during the day, but only succeeded after the last show at 11 p.m. He was talking to me when one of the boys came down and we started to jolly him. Just then another operator came along, and we gave him the wink to get a detective. The gentleman got nine months, and goes to another State when he serves his time here.
> Reading has seventeen picture theaters, a vaudeville and dramatic and two stock houses. Population 97,000. How is that? Projection is good. I am a member of Local 97, I. A. T. S. E.

Well, Brother Seward, inasmuch as you have not "expressed any opinion" about the past, present or future of the I. A. T. S. E., or stated anything that will tend to educate the operator, I suppose it is perfectly safe to publish your name. I am glad you caught the sneak thief (for that is what it amounts to) and that he "got his." We have heard very little from Reading in the past, but trust that she will stop hiding her light under a bushel and get into the game in the future.

Care of Announcement Slides.

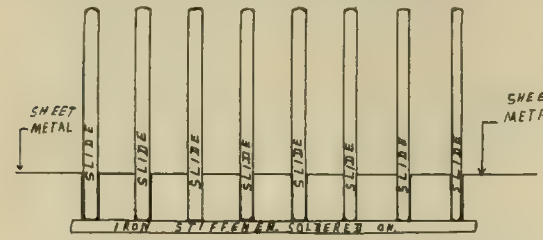
The amount of crass ignorance, carelessness or rank stupidity displayed on the part of operators in the handling of stereopticon slides is nothing short of amazing. Often and often I have watched announcement slides, the surfaces of which were smeared with dirt and grimy finger marks until the appearance was little short of disgusting, displayed on the screen of a theater where the moving picture projection was very good — a credit to the operator. There is absolutely no excuse for such rank work. As I stated in the beginning, it is either the rankest kind of rank carelessness, laziness, ignorance, or stupidity, or all four rolled into one. In the first place, the operator ought to clean his announcement slides every day, just the same as he would clean his lenses, and, in the second place, he should learn to pick up a slide without smearing his fingers all over the surface. In this connection, I would call the undivided attention of operators to an illustration on page 380 of the Handbook, and to the text matter which goes with that illustration. Slides can be handled thus just as easily as any other way, and if they be so handled, the fingers of the operator never touch their surface, hence, finger marks would never appear.

There are a number of methods of keeping announcement slides such as "Good Night," "Just a Minute, Please," and other stock slides which are used every day. One of these is illustrated in the photographic reproduction herewith. It consists of a metal arrangement having a spring under which the slide is slipped, as shown. Each holder accommodates one slide and at the top is a hole by which the holder may be suspended from a nail. This scheme, though is somewhat expensive, and if there were a good many slides the holders would take up considerable space. What seems to me the best plan I have seen, up to date is that used by the operator in the Clemmer Theater, Seattle, Wash. It is shown in the accompanying sketch.



The holder consists of a strip of rather heavy galvanized iron or tin about 4½ inches wide, bent as shown. It can be stiffened, if desired, by soldering a piece of metal to its under side. The advantage is that it holds the slides vertical and in position to be gotten at instantly. The different slots can be numbered, so that any desired slide can be located by its corresponding number. This holder can be made to accommodate any reasonable number of slides.

From Wisconsin.

Mr. Leland Timmers, Seymour, Wis., writes:

> I do not see much in our department concerning this State, therefore take the liberty to let you know that we are still in the land of the living. I have been operating for something like two years, here in Seymour all the time. I like the place quite well. Projection is good, but will be better when a new intermittent movement, now ordered, arrives. Some people think the fault lies with the operator when the pictures are not clear at all times. However, as an experiment of mine showed, dirty film has very much to do with it. Enclosed find a piece of cotton which I fastened to the film guard and allowed it to remain for a time; you can see the result. We have a. c. here and I am using 40 amperes through a Fort Wayne compensarc. Monday is the big day for me for that is the day the Moving Picture World arrives.

Many thanks for your kind words, Brother Timmers. Yes, dirty film has some effect in the way you set forth, and it is true that faults appearing on the screen are not always chargeable to the operator, particularly when he is running old film. I am glad indeed that you have been helped by the Projection Department, because that makes you more capable of putting on a good show and increase the enjoyment of the citizens of your little town who, no doubt, depend very largely upon your theater for their amusement. I have many times pointed out the fact that not only does the improvement in projection help the operator and the manager, but it adds to the enjoyment of the thousands upon thousands of theater patrons.

Nothing Doing.

New Westminster, British Columbia, Canada, inquires as to the union scale of wages in the Eastern States. He also wants to know if I can furnish him with examination papers used in Massachusettts unions. He offers to pay for the same.

I cannot furnish papers because, so far as I know, there are none. Also I would not furnish them if I could, for various reasons. Union examinations are oral, or at least ought to be. As to the scale of wages it varies in different cities, ranging from the minimum of $15 to, so far as I know, a maximum of $27.50. Also, it varies according to the class of house.

Use Lobby Photographs.

Mr. Luther S. Marshall, Corydon, Ky., informs me that he has just opened a pretty little theater, "The Marion," with a seating capacity of 150. The projection equipment is a Power's 6A; the picture is 12 feet; the service is Mutual. He then continues:

> The first thing I did when I got the picture fever was to order the Moving Picture World, and secure a Handbook, and it is to these two things that I attribute my success. I would like to know how I can get my patrons acquainted with the players, so that they will know each and every player in every picture.

The best way to do this would be to secure pictures of the various players, of goodly size, frame them neatly and hang them in the lobby and on the walls of your theater. These pictures may be had from your exchange or from the film manufacturer direct. However, you could hardly expect to have your patrons acquainted with all the players. If they learn to recognize the leaders, that will be all that is necessary. Some of the actors appearing in minor parts do not appear very frequently, and their part usually does not amount to very much anyhow.

New Model? ? ? ?

Mr. John R. Gates, Chicago, Ill., writes:

> I have been told that the American Moving Picture Machine Company has put out a new model of its "Standard" projector. Can you give me any information concerning the same?

I cannot. If the American Moving Picture Machine Company has put out a new model they have not advised this department of that fact, and until they see fit to do so I can give you no information. In this connection, let me say that the American Moving Picture Machine Company, manufacturers of the "Standard" projector; the Precision Machine Company, makers of the Simplex machine; the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company, manufacturers of the Motiograph, and the Edison Company, have each been invited to keep the operators and managers posted, through the columns of this department, on all changes made in their projection apparatus. They have each and every one agreed to do this, and they have each and every one failed to supply a single line describing the changes they have made from time to time. I do not feel that it is up to this department to chase around after these manufacturers. If I offer them valuable space, without money and without price, and they have not the enterprise and good business sense to take advantage of that offer, why I guess it is up to them. However, this much I will say: these manufacturers know that a very large per cent. of the managers and operators of this and several other countries, depend very largely upon the Projection Department for their information concerning projection machinery, and the manufacturers are treating these managers and operators rather shabbily to withhold from them the information which could readily be given.

I think, more than anything else, that the reason of their failure to take advantage of these columns in the manner suggested lies in the fact that they cannot set forth their claims in obvious advertising catalog terms, but must confine themselves to a plain description of the matter and limit their claims of advantage to the use of moderate language.

If the manufacturers used these columns in the way suggested, and made it the duty of some one of their staff to see that every change in their apparatus was duly described and illustrated in the department then operators and managers would be kept in constant touch with improvements and changes in projection machinery. Well, as I said before, it is up to them, so we will let it go at that.

Those Questions.

Lake View, Oregon, discourses as follows:

> I see in the September 6th issue, under "Important Notice," that some person or persons, have raised an objection to the publication of the questions and answers which you started some time ago. I am a small town operator, a constant reader of the World, and own a Handbook, from which I have gathered much valuable knowledge. I cannot see where these questions are going to do any harm, whereas, on the other hand, they will help the operator who really wants to learn far more than anything else you could do. I think you have, on a number of occasions, said that the Department was designed more to help the small town operator, than the city operator. All right. Now suppose you send these questions to unions. Where does the small town operator get off at, unless he pays as much for the questions as the organizations do, which, by the way, would cost him as much to secure as it would cost the organization which has anywhere from fifteen to 300 or 400 members? Moreover, the small town operator could not afford to pay the price.

I publish this letter as setting forth the views held by many small town operators. Comment is unnecessary, as the matter has already been covered.

Operators Are you perfectly satisfied with th results you get on the screen?

"BUNNY FOR THE CAUSE" (Vitagraph), Sept. 26.—This is the picture for the making of which John Bunny and Rose Tapley journeyed to Washington last March and participated in the Suffragette parade. But by no means is this the chief incident. There is a good plot, and in its working out there are amusing incidents. Bunny is a member of the Fat Men's Club, which is anti-Suffrage. Consequently when its members see Bunny in the camp of its enemies there is consternation. They don't know, of course, that whereas Bunny had formerly believed women had not enough brain capacity to qualify them for the ballot, he had so many times been helped out of business difficulties by the excellent judgment of his wife that he had changed his mind. The picture is well made.

"THE POLICEMAN AND THE BABY" (Selig), Sept. 26.—There is insufficient material in this story to justify putting it on the screen. If there is in it a momentary feeling of suspense, of heart interest, or if there is a thrill of any sort, the writer failed to connect with it. A policeman on duty is transferred to a downtown section—why, we did not see; there he is given charge of a baby left in a department store; about to take it to the station he witnesses a bar-room fight. He puts the baby in an automobile and enters the saloon. A man hiding goes out of the door twenty feet ahead of him. By the time the policeman emerges more than ten seconds seem to have elapsed. It turns out later that the man, who is caught, has a reward hanging over him for a thousand dollars. Also it develops that the baby, which he finally gets to the station, is his own!

"THE TAJ MAHAL, AGRA, INDIA" (Selig), Sept. 26.—On the same reel is a short and interesting scenic.

"BIRDS OF PREY" (Patheplay), Sept. 26.—An interesting picture in the science and nature series. It is hand-colored. Many close-up views are given of the type of birds indicated in the title, showing patience and skill on the part of the photographer. Among those shown are the kestrel, hawk and buzzard. One of the most interesting was that of the St. Martin buzzard, weighing eleven ounces and having a spread of wings of forty-four inches.

"SICILY, THE PICTURESQUE" (Patheplay), Sept. 26.—On the same reel are these entertaining views of the Mazzara-del-Valla. A good picture is that of the viaducts supporting the highway up the side of a mountain.

"THE HOBO AND THE MYTH" (Kalem), Sept. 26.—There is amusement in this picture by the Western comedy company when John Brennan, as Woozy Bill, meets up with the punch-bowl and gets into a condition, and there is some more when still in the guise of Pan he runs away from the classic entertainment and escapes on a coal train. There is, however, in this release, which has in it some pretty ensembles, one scene which comes rather near the edge of propriety. It is where Ruth Roland discards the garb of Pan and resumes her street attire, partly screened by a clump of bushes. At the City Theater here on the first run of the picture the piano player utterly neglected his work during this scene—his instrument was dead.

"THE LARGEST DUCK FARM IN THE WORLD" (Kalem), Sept. 26.—On the same reel are interesting pictures of a farm on Long Island where there are 15,000 ducks.

"THE OTHER WOMAN" (Vitagraph), Sept. 24.—A brand new situation, so far as we know, gives more than usual interest to this picture. It is also well developed, too; but perhaps the promise was better than the fulfillment. The two women, one the wife and the other the inamorata of the man, are at the same beach hotel and have become friends since neither suspects. The husband doesn't know that the actress is at that hotel and he is coming to visit his wife, who has their little daughter with her. Coming out on the beach, he finds the child distressed because her mother, out swimming, has called for help. The man is just in time to help the other woman carry the almost drowned wife out of the water. The last scene shows the actress back in the city, lonesome but proudly destroying the man's portrait, while the man is happy with his family. The staging is very careful and the picture is a good offering. Written by Lillian Sweetser, it was produced by Van Dyke Brooke. Leo Delaney plays the man; Norma Talmadge, the wife; Ada Gifford, the other woman, and Helen Costello, the child.

"THE EMBARRASSMENT OF RICHES" (Edison), Sept. 24.—Other producers have used this theme and done even more with it. It is the kind of story that will stand retelling. Edward O'Connor as an Irishman who, made rich by a friendly gnome, finds swell life uncomfortable and asks to be given back his happy poverty, is particularly good. But some of the scenes, markedly that of the swell party, with the exception of the growler incident, is tiresome. In several places the picture is over-done, and in places the action is underdeveloped. The author, Gordon Kaemmerling, deserves not a great deal of credit, nor does the producer, Charles Seay. Gladys Hulette will win sympathy for her Maggie; but, except Clancy, the others do not really belong in the picture.

"LOVE INCOGNITO" (Essanay), Sept. 24.—We suspect that this offering was meant for a comedy; but there was no laughter at all. It seemed pretty bare of amusement to us. There is a story; but this, if the producer wanted to depend upon it, is lamed by his attempts at fun which didn't get over.

"THE SECRET TREASURE" (Patheplay), Sept. 24.—Almost all of George Gebhardt's pictures are more than passable. He is, himself, a very competent player; especially is he convincing and competent as an Indian and a heroic Indian servant, the role he fills in this picture. He works for the miner who owns the hidden treasure, and who trusts him implicitly. Some Mexicans conspire to get possession of the gold. They capture the Indian and try to torture him to tell, without success, and then try to abduct the girl. A lowly friend of the Indian sets him free and he rescues the girl from her burning cabin and there is a pathetic ending.

"SPELL OF THE PRIMEVAL" (Selig), Sept. 24.—The average spectator will probably like this offering, although the statement of the situation may, at first, displease most. It makes its hero of a man who is profligate enough to go off on a spree with fast women when he is engaged to a decent woman. She passes and sees the drunken group and gives him his dismissal. The development then shows how they still love each other and how they are brought together again by his rather far-fetched heroism. It is shown as a part of the development that the man is disgusted with himself, for he throws the whisky bottle away. It is very fairly acted; the story has been thought out and develops clearly. The photography is commendable.

"A DEMAND FOR JUSTICE" (Kalem), September 27.—A story of love and politics, in which Jason, the young lawyer, is discharged as counsel for the water company because he will not draw up an unconstitutional bill. Later he saves the town of Fenwood from the encroachments of the water company and wins the girl in spite of her father's objections. Some of the legal points in this are at fault, but the story is splendidly pictured and fresh enough in subject matter to make it attractive. C. G. Williams, Helen Holmes and Leo D. Maloney play the leads.

"WHY BRONCHO BILLY LEFT BEAR COUNTY" (Essanay), September 27.—A typical Broncho Billy story, containing some characteristic Western scenes, a stage coach robbery and subsequent pursuit on horseback. The girl influences Billy's heart and he restores the gold taken from the stage by Marion's father. Billy assumes the blame for the theft and leaves Bear County. In the final scenes he is shown a religious convert through the girl's interest in his welfare.

"THE GREAT DISCOVERY" (Lubin), September 27.—This is the familiar story of the young man of science whose researches so engross his mind that he neglects his wife. It is well pictured and acted with a degree of charm and sincerity that make the film decidedly interesting. Even the arrival of the scientist's baby does not serve to interrupt his condition of indifference. His wife finally deserts him and three years later he rescues the child at a fire. The abrupt changes from riches to poverty and back again to riches might have been accounted for more fully, but the main theme is brought out clearly. The exact nature of his scientific work might have been shown, though this was not entirely essential.

"THE INFLUENCE OF THE UNKNOWN" (Biograph), September 27.—This film story covers familiar ground, but it does so in a careful, sincere manner and as a result the picture holds the attention very well. At the beginning the observer sees the young revenue officer on the trail of the moonshiners. He pretends to be one of them and only the intervention of the girl saves him from death. She is moved to aid him through seeing a picture of his baby. The photography is smooth and the natural, restrained acting of the girl particularly good. All of the characterizations fit the story and the final scenes are all that could be desired.

"THE FISH WITH A STORAGE BATTERY IN ITS BRAIN" (Patheplay), September 27.—A thoroughly pleasing scientific number, giving views of the electric ray fish in the act of lighting a one candle power incandescent light by its own voluntary electric force.

"THE PEARL OF THE BOSPORUS" (Patheplay), September 27.—Views of Constantinople, showing the mixture of ancient and modern architecture; also the suburb of Pera, where the European and diplomatic colony is located. Same reel with above.

"PROMENADE IN ROME" (Patheplay), September 27.—Pleasing scenes in the City of Rome, showing the facades of famous buildings, fountains, parks and the wolf kept in memory of the Romulus and Remus myth. Same reel with above.

"DAYS OF THE PONY EXPRESS" (Essanay), Sept. 25—Beginning rather slowly, this picture shows speedier action toward the end. It tells an old kind of story. The pony rider is "held up" and then accused by the agent of being in collusion with the thieves. The girl has a sypglass and sees the bad-men dividing the spoil way up on the side of the mountain. She rides to the sheriff and the robbers are captured. Made by the Western company, it is very fairly acted and is pretty good as to photography.

"A CAMBODIAN IDYLL" (Melies), Sept. 25.—Very interesting indeed. The story told by this valuable offering is truly idyllic. It is a love story of native Cambodians; has its rich lover favored by the Cambodian belle's parents and its poor lover whom she favors, and shows how the poor lover, after saving the rich suitor's life, is assisted by him and wins the girl. Truly, it is perfect in its convincing naturalness and simplicity, and very instructive on account of the insight that it gives into Cambodian customs and ways of life. These scenes are acted with absolute sincerity by native players. The photography is fair considering the difficulties.

"BLAZING A NEW TRAIL IN GLACIER NATIONAL PARK" (Patheplay). Sept. 25.—Makes a very good offering. People like to be shown things that are new, if for no better reason than that it gives them something to talk about and do a little crowing over. In this case the views are full of intrinsic interest and are well worth seeing; they give glimpses of mountain scenery far up among the clouds; of glaciers, of wild lakes, of great water falls. And then they have never been pictured before

"THE SAGO INDUSTRY OF BORNEO" (Patheplay), Sept. 25.—Surely it is worth while to know a little about these things; few of us are overinformed as to what the things we use or eat come from. Here is clearly pictured for us how the sago palm tree is cut down and turned into sawdust, which is then soaked and strained for the useful material the pith holds. These two on the same reel make a valuable offering.

"THE CAPTURE OF BAD BROWN" (Selig), Sept. 25.—A Western love story with a good deal of character comedy in it. The audience watched it for the story; but the comedy didn't get over strongly; in fact, it seemed a bit in the way. Buck, played by William Duncan, "wants to marry a teacher (Myrtle Stedman), but is too scared to ask her." The sheriff needs a brave man and chooses Buck to "get" Bad Brown, whom Buck doesn't know is the girl's father. The knock-about search in the village boardinghouse changes it into a farce. When Brown is discovered hiding under Myrtle's bed and captured, the deputy has to comfort her and then he "dast." The kind of work this company does is well-known.

"THE RACE" (Vitagraph), Sept. 25.—A bit more care would have made this conventional melodrama a good deal better. The chief difference between it and many others is that, instead of a horse race, it has an automobile race. Its heroine is very unconvincing, and it has no villain. It trys to make a villain of the banker, a really good sort of fellow, by having him outrageously treated by the girl and also by the hero, to whom he had just promised a loan that he might go on with his engineering work. The hero wins a prize in the race, so doesn't need the loan. In truth, it looks as though the picture was thrown together merely to give pertinency to some views of a motor car race which are only fair. It does neither author nor producer little credit.

"A SATURDAY HOLIDAY" (Biograph), Sept. 25.—A slight farce showing the predicament of Hurry-Up Harry, who takes a swell girl out for a joy ride. His week's salary is ten "bucks." It is like other farces of its kind and there were some in the audience who seemed to enjoy it, for we heard laughter.

"THE END OF THE WORLD" (Biograph), Sept. 25.—On the same reel is this, also a farce; but is fresher than the foregoing. A tramp hoodwinks simple-minded Holy Groaners, telling them that the world is coming to an end. He is clothed in one of their robes that a pal of his had stolen and they believe him and turn over to him all their worldly goods. He waits for more graft and meets with the real prophet and then is chased into the river. ~~William~~ Murray plays the tramp and his comical facial expression amused some in the audience a good deal.

Charles

"PATHE'S WEEKLY, No. 53" (Sept. 25).—Pictures of Mayor Gaynor's funeral, very clearly photographed, are the most notable part of this mid-week topical. There are other items of the usual interest.

"THE STOLEN MODELS" (Edison), Sept. 29.—A pretty little farce with queer characters who time and again aroused the audience to hearty laughter. Gertrude McCoy plays an artist who needs a man model to smoke a pipe; but can't get one suitable. We watch her try out two or three with comical results and then she sees Benjamin Wilson across the court smoking at the window. He, too, is an artist and has had the same difficulty over getting a female model for his picture and he also has already looked across to her window and has painted her without her knowing. The committee at the exhibition hang the two portraits side by side which furnishes a snappy, pleasant ending. The trouble with this as with most farces that we see is that it is too long; it shows padding. Mark Swain is the author, and it was produced by C. Jay Williams. Alice Washburn, as Wilson's housekeeper, who thinks she would make a good model, and Arthur Houseman, as the electric light man in Gertrude's studio, help in the final result.

"DYED, BUT NOT DEAD" (Biograph), Sept. 29.—Red paint is not real evidence, but it surely looks like murder. In this knock-about farce, ~~William~~ Murray, a very clean tramp in the beginning, is suspected of being the crazy culprit; but he is the good-natured victim of the two kids and their pail of red paint. Kate Toncray and Gus Pixley play the parents, and there are three farcical cops, all of whom are amusing in their roles. The offering seemed to please and made a good deal of laughter.

"WITH THE AID OF PHRENOLOGY" (Biograph), Sept. 29.—On the same reel, this farce is not so funny, and there was little sign that it was especially liked. ~~William~~ Murray plays the bossed husband of a new woman. She bats him over the head with the broom and he gets a bump of combativeness that looks so much like a malignant tumor that, watching it, the reviewer's scalp began to itch.

"THE ATHEIST" (Kalem), Sept. 29.—We do not think this picture with a moral clearly dragged in will impress many spectators. It doesn't ring true except at the very end; but the closing episode is very good. The leading role is taken by Tom Moore, who plays with vivacity; but is not able to make his character seem a real human being through most of the action. The photographs are excellent.

"WHEN THE WEST WAS YOUNG" (Vitagraph), Sept. 29.—The artistic, pictorial quality of most of the scenes in this offering give it very high merit; they are lovely and will surely please those who care for art. The story is simple and convincing as a real episode, except that the starving Indian of the early scenes is round of limb and well nourished in appearance. Those who want the story alone will also like it, and there is nothing in the action that seems cheap or that will detract from the delight the discriminating will take in its scenes. W. J. Bauman deserves much credit for the way he has handled this picture, and the story was well written by Wm. Hanson Durham. George Holt plays the settler, father of a little girl (Maxine Elliot), and the friendly Indian is played by George Stanley.

Licensed Specials.

"IN CONVICT GARB" (Essanay), September 26.—This two-reel subject holds interest very steadily throughout the greater part of the picture. Too much is made of the pursuit of the handcar on which the escaped convict and kidnapper of the warden's daughter is trying to get away from his pursuers. It is overdone. The fleeing prisoner must have jumped his handcar over the two dead handcars standing on the same track, as revealed in the flash showing the warden's automobile. It is hardly probable, also, that a man turning state's evidence in an unsuccessful burglary would still be in prison five years after the commission of the crime, especially as a trusty. It was forcing a situation to put in as warden of the prison and over the convicted cashier the man who won a wife by reason of his rival's downfall. In the print seen the warden's wife twice descended the stairs from the room where the whistle rope was. It appeared like a retake overlooked. The prison scenes are exciting, and are well put on. E. H. Calvert was strong as the convicted cashier, although inclined to overact in one or two scenes. Ruth Stonehouse played well in the role of the wife of the warden.

"HARD CASH" (Edison), September 26.—There are good situations and strong ones, too, in this two-part adaptation from the novel of Charles Reade. Some of the best of these begin at the point where Captain Dodd, finely portrayed by Charles Ogle, has rescued young Hardie from the burning insane asylum and stands on the cliff overlooking the surf below. The picture is well played throughout. Bigelow Cooper, Barry O'Moore, Miss McCoy and Richard Tucker are especailly deserving of mention for good work. An excellent release.

"FOR HIS BROTHER'S CRIME" (Cines), Sept. 23.—This two-part feature offering is an artistic production in all save the construction of its story. Its plot is coherent enough and, with the exception of one very weak part, plausible enough to interest. Of the two brothers, both of whom love the same girl, one earns an honest living as a butler. The other, favored of the girl, tries so hard to make a fortune that, being unsuccessful, grows dissipated, becomes a thief, and robs the house of his brother's employer. The fastening of the crime on the good brother won't hold water one minute. The ending in which the good brother gets the widow is a bit too sentimental for most of us, we fear. The picture has some fine scenes, such as an Italian court of justice, Italian prisoners at work, etc. The players are natural; the photography is very clear, and many of the backgrounds are full of beauty.

"A MIDNIGHT MESSAGE" (Kalem), Sept. 24.—A picture story notable for the dramatic quality of its action, which is full of suspense, except at the climax, where three persons, an elderly father, his very pretty second wife and his son by a former wife, are standing together, and a thieving butler has accused the son falsely to the jealous father. This is full of dramatic possibilities and in a play-dialogue would have lengthened the suspense and made it effective; but in the picture there are no attempts, so it seems, to explain anything, and the result makes the characters seem stupid and, for a moment, ineffective. The situation is, in the beginning, delightfully introduced and pretty carefully developed. There are clearly-drawn characters, natural acting in distinguished scenes with perfect photography. Alice Joyce's prettiness is also of much use in this picture. Henry Hallem plays the father; Alice Joyce, his second wife; Tom Moore, his son, and James Cooper, his butler. Everyone of these is good, especially the last as a character.

"SELF-CONVICTED" (Lubin), Sept. 25.—It is a novel idea to give a man who had escaped from prison and become a detective his own Bertillion identification data and ask him to go out and hunt for himself. This melodramatic picture exists for this. It begins without a love story, although at the time of the climax, the detective has a wife and child, brought in, of course, to give the situation punch. This is already enough to make the offering acceptable, although there are three unnecessary blemishes in it that noticeably weaken it. It wasn't made clear what the hero was doing at the mill when the strike was talked of. If he were a workman, he becomes a traitor, in the atmosphere of the story, to his cause when, after averting a bad strike, he becomes a detective to fight all strikes, good or bad. Then, when later he has taken home the "mug" and the finger prints, he loses nerve, becomes a coward; there was no conscience in it at all. At the end he shows a flash of nerve; but goes against conscience. Then, to have his wife play the snoop, was not desirable in a melodrama and harmed our opinion of her. A melodrama should shut its eyes to unpleasant weaknesses in its heroine. It cannot be said that the heroine or any of the cast acted strongly; the heroine is plainly not equal yet to such demands as her part made. The picture is staged very well.

"THE INVISIBLE GOVERNMENT" (Selig), Sept. 29.—There is very little that is probable in the story told by this picture; but our interest is kept awake; for with such perfect photography and such careful handling, especially as to staging, it could not be wholly a failure. The players also help it much by their unconstrained acting. They are as natural as the script would let them be; but the script is very unconvincing. This is the second of the "Man in the Street" stories and, while it is a complete story, it assumes that the spectator has seen the former and will understand that the "Man" is a detective. We heard one spectator ask whether he were the District Attorney, which, in the early scenes he seemed to be. Thomas Carrigan carries the detective's role as well as in the first of the series. Frank Weed, as the "Invisible boss," and Jack Nellson, as his son, also do well—the affection of these two, which convinces, is the story's biggest asset. Oscar Eagle produced it.

Independent.

"THE PILGRIM" (Powers), October 10.—In this, as in several recent numbers featuring Edwin August, there has been lack of harmony in plot and setting. Mr. August's forceful personality requires unusual care in these matters. This allegorical offering gives us a sad jumble of time and place, ranging from the stone age up to the days of briar pipes and smoking tobacco. The story itself is none too interesting, though it might have answered if the atmosphere of the production had been better.

"THE ECHO OF A SONG" (Rex), October 12.—The leading character in this is a man posing as a modern Fagin. The characterization seemed to us rather revolting in point of makeup and the part was overacted. He hears his daughters singing in the church and is confronted with visions of his past. The whole episode was too fragmentary to be considered a plot.

"THE TRAIL OF THE LONESOME MINE" (Nestor), October 6.—There is a lot of good horseback riding in this picture, which will interest the lovers of westerns. The story is of a man falsely accused of being a horse thief, but who, with the aid of his wife and the wife of the sheriff, establishes his innocence.

"CHIVALRY DAYS" (Powers), October 8.—A grown-up story acted by the Universal juvenile company in California. All of the settings and props are in miniature, with ponies for horses and all that sort of thing. It is a South before the war drama with deep dyed plots, and dark villainy. The acting of the kids is very clever and the whole idea, though serious, is very funny. Children everywhere will rave over this picture, and also the grown folks. Any picture that can get continual laughs out of a room full of hardened reviewers and censors is going some.

"OUR BABY" (Gem), October 6.—A half reel containing some interesting studies of child life. The baby plasters itself with mud and jam, smokes a pipe and does the tango. Better effects would have been obtained with more moderation.

"THOU SHALT NOT RUBBER" (Imp), October 11.—A young boy masquerading by accident as a girl attracts a large following of men by virtue of the shapely limbs in this part reel comedy of frivolous people. The "rubbernecks" come to grief in a pond and the boy's mother leads him home at the finish by one of his ears. The film is mildly amusing.

"THE SIMPLE LIFE" (Nestor), October 10.—This was no doubt intended for smart comedy of a breezy sort, but in reality it goes so far over the line as to be offensive. The audience should have been shown in the beginning that the supposed bachelor was really married to his young housekeeper; as it stands the situation becomes impossible before the joke is arrived at. But even if the marriage were known, the hiding of the silverware in the housekeeper's unoccupied bed would be decidedly broad comedy.

"DRESS REFORM" (Crystal), Oct. 7.—The young wife's mother arrives and insists on Pearl wearing bloomers. Chester, to punish them, dresses as a woman. Quite an amusing situation results.

"BALDY BELMONT WANTED A WIFE" (Crystal), Oct. 7.—On same reel with above, Baldy advertises for a wife and when he succeeds in locating one that can cook, his false friend marries her. Simple in plot, but diverting.

"THE WOMAN AND THE LAW" (Crystal), Oct. 12.—Pearl loves Chester, but marries another. Her husband is afflicted with lung trouble and must be sent to a warmer climate. Pearl steals money from the landlord and is apprehended. A dramatic offering, telling a story of only ordinary interest and lacking any great degree of strength or feeling. The photography is good.

"LOVE ME, LOVE MY DOG" (Apollo), Sept. 14.—A "train" story, reaching clear across the continent. The wife is on the same train with her flirtatious husband and his valet. The first scenes occur in California and the final ones at the Pennsylvania station in New York. The wife cures her husband of flirting by giving him a dose of his own medicine. Well pictured, but not overly strong in plot.

"THE REVELATION" (Kaybee), October 10.—Mr. Burns, a student of Theosophy, has a dream in the hammock. He sees himself, his wife and her admirer, in a previous existence. These scenes, in which the characters wear skins and fight with clubs and stones, were not very pleasing. The costumes were too scant and the scenes lacked the feeling of reality. This idea has been worked out previously in stronger form.

"THE MOTOR BUG" (Gem), Oct. 6.—This is the old story of a community frightened by news of an escaped lunatic from the adjacent asylum and the wrong man being taken for the fugitive. There are incidents in this picture that will amuse, according to the composition of a house.

"BILLY DODGES BILLS" (Keystone), Oct. 2.—This pictures a young man pursued by his creditors. He flees from his boarding house and goes down to the beach, where much of the ensuing action takes place on the various amusement devices. After finally being captured by his creditors he inherits a large estate. There is some amusement in this, but it is hardly up to the Keystone standard.

"THE LOVE TRAIL" (Nester), Oct. 8.—This drama of the West swings around the mistaken notion of a girl that she has killed a "bad man." The story is not so clear as it might be, but the situations are quickly unfolded and the action is spirited.

"THE WIFE MUST FOLLOW THE HUSBAND" (Eclair), Oct. 12.—A newly married couple have some amusing adventures in this film because the groom is a policeman who is called to capture a dangerous criminal while he is eating his wedding supper. The bride bravely follows and assists her new husband. The result is very spirited comedy.

"ROTIFERA" (Eclair), Oct. 12.—Dividing the reel with the above is this natural history subject, dealing with the life and habits of a micro-organism found in ponds and raingutters and the like. These pictures are always interesting.

"THE SPEED BEAR" (Apollo), Sept. 28.—In this offering Fred Mace drives an auto named "The Speed Bear." The scenes are full of action, but rather confused and lacking a very strong plot element. An auto race at Santa Monica is featured in the picture.

"A MAN OF THE WILDERNESS" (Majestic), Oct. 4.—A Western offering in which the atmosphere did not seem exactly true to life. Williams intervenes in the love affair between the girl and the trapper. The former is caught in a bear trap, but refuses to marry the girl after being released. When the trapper forces him to appear at the wedding, the girl rejects him and gives her love to the trapper.

"THE TWINS AND THE OTHER GIRL" (Thanhouser), Oct. 3.—A story with a very slight plot, introducing the Thanhouser Kidlet and the more recent acquisition, the Twins. The latter's parents separate, each one taking a twin, but the Kidlet plays "Black Hand" and succeeds in reuniting the family. Not strong, but pleasing.

"THE SURF MAIDENS" (Gem), Oct. 13.—A beach comedy number, written by Capt. Leslie T. Peacock. The arrival of the chorus girls at the seashore creates consternation among the wives, and admiration among the men. But the wives retaliate by getting brief bathing costumes of their own. The humor did not develop very strongly in this number, though it has a fair degree of interest.

"THE LOVE OF CONCHITA" (Majestic), Sept. 28.—A story with a Mexican setting, which ends tragically. Conchita, a high-bred Spanish girl, becomes enamoured of Romeriz, an outlaw. The various scenes are stirring and well handled, though somewhat conventional in type. She rides to warn Romeriz, who is shot and killed. The costuming is a feature carefully attended to.

"A SLIGHT MISUNDERSTANDING" (Majestic), Sept. 27.—Many have been the comedies built around the mixing up of two letters, and like many of its predecessors, this offering is successful. Smith's theater tickets go to his washerwoman, and his note of protest against the ruination of his shirt fronts goes to his best girl. The results are laughable and make a very pleasing offering of its kind.

"WHEN THE DEBT WAS PAID" (Majestic), Sept. 30.—The counterfeiting scenes in this film did not have quite the proper atmosphere, it seemed, as the story was not very convincing. It was hard to believe, in the casual development of the plot, that the young doctor was really a member of the band. The piece is not without interest, in spite of its improbability, and is helped materially by good photography.

"THE FARMER'S DAUGHTERS" (Thanhouser), Sept. 28.—One of the brightest and most original comedies shown by this company in some time. The daughters of the farmer did some very good character work in fooling the young college graduates, who were bent on matrimony. A neat, well-acted and clearly-photographed film story.

"THE INVADER" (Lubin), Sept. 29.—A melodrama that is played and produced so conventionally that it is not always convincing in small things. In some of the scenes though, it is natural and believable. The plot is not a bad one, but by no means new; it will hold attention. The backgrounds are interesting and pretty well photographed. A fair offering.

"WHEN FATHER GOES TO CHURCH" (Frontier), Oct. 9.—A rural comedy in which a hired man, a hired girl, a preacher and the pretty daughter of the father who does not like to go to church are the principal characters. The characterization of the old man is good and the film will win its laugh.

"WILLIE'S GREAT SCHEME" (Crystal), Oct. 21.—Willie gets a friend to flirt with auntie while he makes love to the niece. This is his "great scheme," and how it works out is well told in this amusing little comedy.

"THE TURKISH RUG" (Crystal), Oct. 21.—A hobo steals a newly purchased rug in this breezy farce which appears on the same reel as the above.

"HARMONY AND DISCORD" (Frontier), Oct. 11.—A dissolute son goes West in this spirited drama and has redeemed both his character and his fortune when he marries the daughter of the ranchman who gave him a job when he first landed in the West. The photography is very good in this picture.

"HIDDEN FIRES" (Imp), Oct. 13.—In this excellent, well-balanced drama, an actress goes to a seashore for knowledge of simple fishermen and gets it when one of them falls in love with her. He is a young man, this lover, and his love so frightens her that she sends for her husband. The situation thus developed holds attention from first to last. The acting is good, the settings are interesting, and we are furnished an entertaining story. This film gets over in good shape.

"LEAVES FROM HY. MAYER'S SKETCH BOOK" (Imp), Oct. 18.—A number of characteristic drawings by the well-known cartoonist.

"THE CLOWN AND THE BEGGAR" (Imp), Oct. 18.—This, on same reel with above, presents a clown in a balancing act, which proves fairly interesting to the observer.

"ROGER, THE PRIDE OF THE RANCH" (Nestor), Oct. 13.—The story of an old-fashioned horse race, in which the girl rides her pretty, white equine to victory. The plot is not very fresh, but the scenes are well photographed and the story has a good climax.

"PEARL'S MISTAKE" (Crystal), Oct. 14.—One of Pearl White's and Chester Barnett's bright little comedies, in which Pearl advises her maid's sweetheart how to propose to the maid and thereby creates misunderstandings and amusing complications.

"GETTING THE GRIP" (Crystal), Oct. 14.—Sharing the reel with the above is this comedy sketch in which "maw" tries to row a boat, upsets it, and thus begins some interesting and laughable adventures.

"HEARTS ENTANGLED" (Crystal), Oct. 19.—The title is well chosen. This drama of the West tells of many marriages which somehow cross each other and create disturbances. Miss White's acting carries the film. It is a fair offering.

"MEMORIES" (Rex), Oct. 16.—This is a very pretty allegory showing the progress of a maid from her innocence to the wisdom of a mature woman. The production is artistic, admirably staged and will win many friends. It is a good offering.

"A VENETIAN ROMANCE" (Key-Bee), Oct. 17.—Fine settings and careful costuming make this production memorable. The setting and atmos-

[illegible] have just [illegible] expanding the plot into a two-part number. [illegible] streets, Venice and Genoa, and has a good love [illegible]. An entertaining number.

"CRIMINALS" (Rex), Oct. 19.—This film story suffers throughout its entire length from short, choppy scenes, with no compelling chain of incidents for the observer to follow. The intent of the picture is also quite vague. There is an interesting case of dual personality, the girl's father being none other than John Dick, safecracker. She runs across him in her settlement work and they both attempt robbery at the same time, for different reasons. With clearer treatment and more logical plot development, this might have made a strong picture; but as it stands, it is disappointing.

"THE CLUE" (Rex), Oct. 20.—An entertaining offering in which Phillips Smalley appears as a detective. Murder is committed at a society function and he traces the crime by finger prints. Some of the situations are melodramatic, but as a picture, this is better than the average.

"THE SOUL OF MAN" (Solax), Sept. 26.—This story is of a minister who reforms a crook. The picture is well put on and well acted. Joseph Levering plays the minister; Darwin Karr, the crook; Violet Horner, the wife of the latter, and little Master Lathrop, the child.

Independent Specials.

"ONE OF THE RABBLE" (Eclair), Oct. 8.—A two-part special offering. No picture could have a much better situation than this; but in its development there are unconvincing things and the result is not so good as the opening scenes led us to hope for. Milly Bright plays a young woman of fashion who is proud and silly and thinks herself above common people. One day, by a well-arranged series of circumstances, she finds herself stranded in a strange city with no money or friends. A few truthful scenes following this would have produced an effect much deeper than the ultra-romantic love story that develops. The girl is attacked by roughs and her rescuer fights a bar-room full to save her till the police come. This scrap is a wonder in its way; no one will go to sleep watching it. In stagecraft the picture shows merit; but the story is not convincing. It will make a fair offering.

"THE GIRL AND THE TIGER" (Bison), Oct. 7.—A three-reel subject employing many of the Universal City's new assortment of animals, including elephants, camels and tigers. Lieut. Clifford falls in love with the Maharajah's favorite nautch girl. He is lured on a hunting trip in the jungle and is rescued from death by the nautch girl after many thrilling experiences. The Hindu characters and setting are fairly well realized in this, although some of the architecture is of improper type. The jungle scenes in the second and third reel furnish most of the interest. Considerable overacting is apparent throughout the film, but the picture is entertaining.

"A FORGOTTEN MELODY" (Broncho), Oct. 8.—A two-reel Western offering, telling a strong and appealing story of an old music composer and his daughter. They cross the plains and become separated during an Indian massacre, which was very strongly pictured. Later the girl finds a producer for the opera written by her father and he appears during the rehearsals and supplies the "missing melody." There is something very effective about this film offering, and the closing scenes are particularly sincere and memorable.

"IN THE WILDS OF AFRICA" (Bison), Oct. 14.—An entertaining outdoor number in two reels, giving close views of the elephants, tigers and other animals at Universal City. Native Africans and visiting Arabs help out the cleverly-devised setting. The story is very entertaining, though it cannot be said to be really exciting. The adventures of the child in the jungle with a friendly chimpanzee furnished a decidedly unique situation. The doctor's cabin is burned and the family is reunited after wandering at random in the wilds. A good release.

"FRED'S TRAINED NURSE" (Apollo), Sept. 21.—This two-reel farcical number is characterized by good photography and breezy acting. The plot will not strike some observers as being worth two reels, but it is a light, engaging concoction and will bring many laughs. Fred Mace is featured as a young man in love with a trained nurse. He feigns illness in order to be taken to her hospital. Later, his friends follow suit. They dance with the nurses and demoralize the hospital staff, the result being that they are ousted from the institution and the nurses suspended for two weeks. Pleasing light comedy.

"LIFE'S PATHWAY" (Thanhouser), Sept. 30.—A two-reel number which gets up a strong interest in the life drama of twin girls. They are first seen as babies, then as children of perhaps 10 years and later Florence LaBadie doubles on the part and plays both sisters. One girl is adopted by rich people and later falls in the social scale after ruining her husband by extravagance. The second sister becomes a settlement worker. All of the closing part of the picture was hurried and ineffective, which was the more disappointing because the theme was a strongly dramatic one and should have worked up to a satisfactory climax.

"FIGHTERS OF THE PLAINS" (Bison), Oct. 11.—This two-reel production concerning pioneers, Indians and cowboys tells a good, strong story about a little girl who was captured by the redskins to grow up among them and cause trouble, which, however, she converts into a blessing at the end. A rattling good fight between the Indians and the cowboys is presented and the film has a delightful flavor of adventure throughout. It will be liked.

"TARGETS OF FATE" (Reliance), Oct. 4.—A two-reel film story, written by Adele Luhrman. The plot has been done several times in various ways, but never we think in a more pleasing or better-pictured form than it is shown here. The scenes of the first reel were particularly good, including the escape from the big steamer in life boats, the men tossed about on the high sea on a raft, the rescue, and others. The manner in which the first husband's memory was restored by an operation and his final decision to bury his former identity forever, complete the story satisfactorily. Rosemary Thebe, Thomas R. Mills and Stanley Walpole play the leads.

"THE FIREFLY" (Film Releases of America).—This is a four-part picture made by the Kinograf Company. There are sensational scenes in it, but it would have made a stronger feature had it been shorter. There are improbabilities and inconsistencies. The boy grown to manhood under the domination of the gypsy obtains employment as a chauffeur when nothing has indicated that he had ever seen a machine. Later, he takes back to her old home the daughter of the countess, kidnapped twelve years before, which proves he knew how to find it and consequently could have done it at any time during these years. The dropping of the letter of proposal at the feet of the chauffeur was hackneyed. Ralph's escape from the tower of the castle, his sensational climb over the wires to drop then into the water, and his long swim back to extinguish the burning fuse attached to the bomb necessarily required far more time than would have been required to consume one foot of slowmatch. On the other hand, the "firefly" scene in the theater was finely done. The tinting from one color to another as the woman swung in the air, suspended by a wire, made an unusual spectacle. The photography is of high quality.

"IN A SERPENT'S COILS" (A. K. C.).—This multiple-reel picture is supposed to be made in California, but it must be said that there is not an American note in it. It will take no keen eye to discover that not only is there lacking the atmosphere of the west coast, but that distinctly there is present the atmosphere of the other side of the water. The so-called desert is a meadow. The carts used in crossing the waste are those made familiar in foreign pictures, as also are some of the structures. There are some good photographic sunset effects, which make a feature of the pursuit along the beach. The snakes will furnish a thrill.

"THE GOD OF CHANCE" (Domino), Oct. 9.—A two-reel number, written by William H. Clifford, with the scenes laid in England and America during the days of Puritanism. The English settings were very beautiful and attractive and the story gets under headway very nicely, illustrating the manner in which Purity starts for America with her father. The scenes laid in this country also appeal to the observer. The story has action and a certain historical interest. The love element was of a rather uncertain nature, but the scene in the mill was above the ordinary. A good release.

"THE GIRL O' THE WOODS" (Victor), Oct. 17.—This two-reel subject, written by C. H. Hoadly, and produced by H. L. Solter, is a remarkably strong and entertaining number. Florence Lawrence, the recent acquisition of the Universal forces, gives us a life-like picture of a girl reared in the wilds. She battles for an existence among the rough men of the community. Her love for the young artist was a real and tragic thing. The backgrounds are well chosen, the photography above the ordinary, and the direction good. The story moves smoothly and there is no abatement of interest, the strong personality of Miss Lawrence being shown to the best advantage. A strong feature number.

"THE DARE-DEVIL MOUNTAINEERS" (Imp), Oct. 16.—A two-reel offering, which could well have been shown in one reel. Rodman Law appears in the part of Slow Jim. Over-acting is perhaps the chief fault of the production, though the story is not very new. The latter half of the second reel contains the most interesting situations, where Jim and the girl make a lightning escape on a motorcycle and plunge off the open draw-bridge into the water. The lively finish helps the picture very much.

"FROM THE BEYOND" (Eclair), Oct. 15.—A weird offering in three reels. People fond of occult subjects will reveal in this conglomeration of spiritualistic practices. Others will feel that they are going through a series of horrible psychical experiences. The story is not to be considered seriously, though it is well pictured and clearly presented. The professor appears after his supposed death to haunt his rival. Double photography is employed to bring about his ghostly visits. The plot is slow in developing and two reels would have answered to cover the incidents depicted. The sarcophagus and other accessories employed helped the atmosphere of the production.

"THE WINNER" (Victor), Oct. 10.—This two-reel drama of the race track tells the story of a jockey who went down and came up again in fine shape, in the end winning a very important race and marrying his employer's daughter. Some excellent race scenes are shown, and the situations throughout are exciting. The production is good.

"THROUGH BARRIERS OF FIRE" (Bison), Oct. 18.—Edwin August produced this picture and plays the leading part, that of a young Confederate soldier, a two-reel drama of the Civil War. The main situation, well developed through interesting action, appears when the hero, the above-mentioned soldier, after shooting a Union man in a fair fight, takes refuge in his widow's house to escape capture as a spy. Some exciting battle scenes occur and the driving of the ammunition wagon through a barrier of fire, the incident which affords a title for the play, is both novel and thrilling.

DEATH OF EDWARD HARRINGTON.

An old time film exchange man and a very lovable character passed away on Wednesday, September 24, when Edward M. Harrington breathed his last at the Polyclinic Hospital in New York City. Mr. Harrington's death is greatly deplored by his many friends, who think that fate was a bit unkind in taking him away at the early age of 34.

Eddie Harrington's most valuable asset was his engaging personality. It made a successful man of him, from a small beginning to a position of moderate wealth. In 1907 he started the Actograph Film Exchange on 17th Street, near Fourth Avenue, New York, on a capital of fifty dollars. Before long he took in as a partner, Mr. Frank Belcher, a New York attorney and his loyal friend. The Actograph prospered and a branch was established in Albany. Two years ago the Actograph Company was absorbed by the General Film Company and Mr. Harrington was retained as manager of the Albany exchange. He became very popular in Albany and gained a wide circle of acquaintances. While there he became interested in the exhibition end of the business and invested in a theater circuit in Northern New York.

The interment was at Syracuse, the city where Mr. Harrington was born and which he considered his home. He was unmarried and is survived by his father.

Indiana Exhibitors in Convention

State Branch Reorganizes and Pledges Allegiance to National Organization—Officers Elected.

Chicago, October 1—The convention proceedings for the reorganization of the Indiana Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America were opened in the Severn Hotel, Indianapolis, yesterday afternoon at 2 o'clock with President M. A. Neff in the chair. This was an open meeting, and a number of members of the association were present, among them being Dr. J. M. Rhodes, Indianapolis; F. J. Rembusch, Shelbyville, and E. H. Zaring, Fort Wayne. President Neff announced that the opening session would be immediately followed by an executive session and that those who wished to remain, excepting delegates to the national convention at New York, might do so providing they avowed their allegiance to the League. Mr. Neff stated that it was only natural men should have honest differences and that an honest heart-to-heart talk often brought together those who had disagreed.

Mr. Rembusch said he had done a great deal of work three years ago in organizing the Indiana League Branch. He had always found the utmost cordiality and good fellowship at all the state meetings. He had noticed a spirit of brotherhood at these gatherings which he had not seen in any other state. On this occasion he was spokesman for no one but himself. He believed Indiana exhibitors should stick together. At the recent association meeting no one in particular was censured. At that meeting it was the feeling of exhibitors that if there were two organizations they would have nothing to do with either. He lauded the Indianapolis local for the loyalty of its members. The members of the local had stood together in the recent strike of the operators and their business interests had been protected. A state organization was also important, as it enabled exhibitors to act as a unit against unfavorable laws. We also believed in a national organization—one, not two. He strongly recommended reconciliation and expressed regret over the bolt at the New York convention because a great mistake had been made by dividing the parent organization. He urged that existing differences be eliminated and said a beginning could be made in Indiana. He suggested that President Neff should invite those who had severed connection with the League to rejoin.

President Neff said that he was placed in a difficult position so far as the seceding delegates were concerned. They must await the action of the national executive committee, which will meet in Cincinnati early in January. As for other exhibitors in Indiana who had supported the delegates, they will be reinstated by reavowing allegiance to the League before the state officers.

Dr. J. M. Rhodes then took the floor to answer charges against his stewardship in the disbursement of certain funds. He promised that any Indiana exhibitor could see the books and satisfy himself that every cent was accounted for. He denied the right of the National League to examine these books, as it's prerogative was confined to an examination only so far as the per capita tax was concerned. President Neff then ordered that the charter of the Old Indiana Branch of the League and other papers, books, etc., be turned over to the new state president. He then expressed the hope that Indiana would shortly be solidified in one organization.

The following officers were elected: National Vice-President, Phillip Gloeckner, Palace Theater, Richmond; State President, J. C. Lockwood, Princess and Ideal Theaters, Frankfort; Secretary and Treasurer, J. W. Cochran, Theatrum, Washington. It was decided that the Ohio state constitution and bylaws be in force until the next state meeting, which will be held the first Tuesday in March. The meeting pledged its allegiance to the national organization.

MOVIES FOR TEACHING RAILROAD SAFETY.

A letter from L. F. Shield, general safety supervisor of the Rock Island lines, addressed to E. E. Fulton, a Chicago supply dealer, is interesting as evidence of the far reaching benefits of the motion picture and its application to almost any line of endeavor. This is not the first instance where a large corporation has used films to instruct its help but it is none the less noteworthy in showing the steady progress of the motion picture. The letter follows:

"Replying to your request as of June 30th, for testimonials or photographs in connection with motion pictures used on our safety work, beg to advise that we have a reel of motion pictures that were staged by the undersigned, and taken by the Advance Motion Picture Company, of this City, which reel was the very first to demonstrate the dangerous and the safe way to perform railroad work, and to be used to entertain and educate our employes, our passengers, our patrons and the general public to the neccessity of eliminating dangerous and unnecessary chances and thus conserve life and limb.

"After the pictures were ready, a machine to display them was necessary and after considerable inquiry, we decided on Power's 6-A, purchased it from you, and it is eminently satisfactory. In fact it was said at Peoria, Illinois, that we had the finest outfit that ever entered that city. Power's machine was used there on May 7th, and assisted to interest the 2500 that assembled. It has been used elsewhere to large audiences, and the entertainment has been appreciated. It is giving entire satisfaction and does what we hoped it would do."

LAWRENCE GRIFFITH OUT OF BIOGRAPH.

Famous Director Severed Connection with That Company on October 1—Has Been Making Pictures Five Years.

Lawrence Griffith, the man who made Biograph films famous the world over and who by practically all American motion picture men is conceded one of the greatest producers of silent drama, severed his connection with the Biograph Company on October 1. In spite of the fact that some of the wise ones have for some time been expecting an important move on the part of Mr. Griffith, his announcement of his resignation came as a surprise to the men and women who for the past five years have worked under his direction. Mr. Griffith went to the Biograph company as an extra at the rate of $5 a day. It was not long before he was given an opportunity to make a picture. His success was pronounced. In a short time he was in charge of the Biograph producing forces. His salary has been generally conceded to be the highest of any employe of a motion picture manufacturer in the world.

It is not known at this writing what Mr. Griffith's plans are. It is understood he is considering several propositions. The announcement of his intentions will be awaited by film men and by exhibitors with lively interest.

GERMAIN HAS FEATURE SERVICE.

Mr. L. Germain, who has long been connected in various branches of the motion picture industry, has placed all of his motion picture feature interests with the National Feature Film Service, Inc.

L. Germain.

Such productions as Sarah Bernhardt in "Camille," Madame Rejane in "Madame Sans Gene," Helen Gardner in "Cleopatra," have been the class that he has offered to motion picture exhibitors.

The latest big feature that he has secured for States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, District of Columbia, Ohio and Indiana, is Ambrosio's masterpiece "The Betrothed," from the romance by Alexander Manzoni, in six reels.

A stamp of consideration and reliability has always marked anything L. Germain has been connected with in the motion picture line. It therefore follows that the National Feature Film Service, in which he is actively interested, will be a welcome factor that the exhibitor will appreciate.

Headquarters have been established at 552-554 Fifth Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y. (Phone 516-J South), with branches at Philadelphia, Pa., New Jersey, Dayton, Ohio, Cleveland, Ohio.

NEW PICTURE MUSIC.

The Bastion Supply Co. has published a set of melodramatic music arranged for orchestra—ten parts and piano. Their advertisement will appear later.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"DEAR OLD GIRL" (Essanay).

To say that the production "Dear Old Girl" is a drama of more than ordinary merit is putting it mildly. Great admiration will be shown by the audience for the hero, Francis X. Bushman, in his peculiarly sympathetic role. To have lost the girl you love is one of the hardest blows a human can receive, but to lose your mind as a reward for your faithfulness and undying love is a penalty the most hardened criminal should not receive. Ted Warren (Francis X. Bushman), a student at Cornell University is madly in love with Dora Allen (Beverly Bayne). The time has been set for the wedding. As the gay party are speeding to Ithaca, New York, there to meet Ted, the train is wrecked. Ted's devotion and love for Dora and her untimely end drives the student mad.

Scene from "Dear Old Girl" (Essanay).

The boys' sympathy and love for their college chum takes an upper hand and they lead the now wrecked man to the railroad station every morning, only to see the train pull in, and then speed out on its journey—and Dora always fails to arrive. The old church chimes continue to ring out with the melody of "Dear Old Girl," which has a tendency to make Ted realize something—something—just something. He cannot tell what. Weeks pass and the same routine follows—to the railroad station and back, and always—Dora does not come. The end is pathetically sad, and as we see our hero walking, sometimes running, down the tracks to meet the incoming train, we know that the end cannot be far distant, and the painful ending that brings a lump into the throat of the onlooker dies away easily as Ted passes on into another world to meet his sweetheart, Dora. "Dear Old Girl," is a worthy production and a photoplay that will be remembered as a heart interest one.

This production is booked for release Friday, October 10th.

"THE GALLOWS OF THE GODS."

Film Releases of America.

The familiar principle of the villain being "hoist by his own petard" is utilized strikingly in this subject. The bad man, seeking to kill the pursuing hero, steps in the way of the windmill's arm, is caught in its mesh, swung high aloft, from thence to drop to mutilation and death. There's fate for you! Rough country and rougher men are the scenes and characters. Beauty of landscape obviates the artificial and, as the humorist would say: "This is a lovely place for a murder."

Scene from "The Gallows of the Gods."

The story concerns itself with the nearly successful efforts of a civil engineer to fix upon the girl who has spurned him the guilt of having stolen the money for the pay-roll. This engineer is not much more adapted for successful villainy than for engineering and he has the wrong idea in regard to the proper handling of accomplices. Instead of "splitting" a la politics, he "annoys" the accomplice by hitting him. Of course, the accomplice "squeals," making it possible for the story to have a happy ending. A rousing tale this, and the fact of it having been cut several hundred feet considerably accelerates its action.

GAUMONT BUYS "ARIZONA" FOR GREAT BRITAIN.

The All Star Feature Corporation has sold to the Gaumont Company the exclusive rights to "Arizona" for England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales. The purchase of this feature from the All Star by a company like Gaumont, which has made many noteworthy features of its own, is regarded as a high compliment to the producers of this fine American six reel feature. "Arizona" was staged as a photodrama by Augustus Thomas, the author of the play; contains two hundred and ten scenes and consists of six reels. The purchase was made with the proviso that the All Star Feature Corporation would give the Gaumont Company an option for the English rights on all future productions.

"BREED OF THE NORTH" (Lubin).

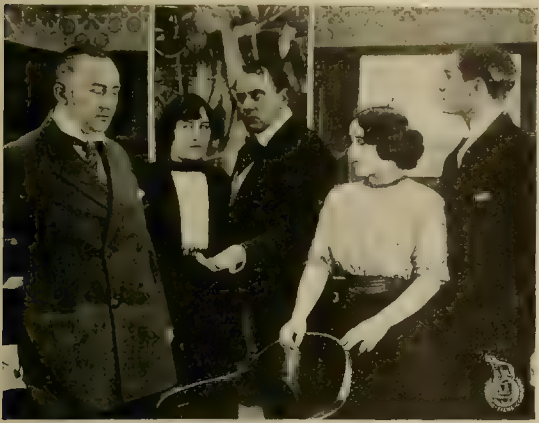
This very dramatic picture has a unique quality in the fact that the leading roles are twin brothers and the two parts are played by one man, the scenes being so arranged that both characters are seen in the same picture. It is undoubtedly a clever piece of photography, and many situations are intensely thrilling. The atmosphere of Canadian border life is well preserved and very picturesque.

John and Jim, twin brothers, are in love with Molly. Jim wins out and John joins the Northwest Mounted. Later, Jim, a fugitive for a crime he did not commit, is in hiding along the border, and John with Phillips, another officer, takes up the chase, not knowing the fugitive is his brother. After a terrible chase the brothers, exhausted and starved, meet. John is torn between love for his brother and Molly, and makes Jim change clothes with him and escape. John shaves to complete the deception and is taken prisoner as the fugitive later by his brother officer. Molly refuses to join Jim over the border when she discovers the prisoner is not her husband and Jim comes back disguised as John and takes his place in jail unknown to anyone but Molly. John, disguised as himself, takes up the trail and finally locates the real murderer in Nelson and forces him to confess. Jim is freed and John leaves his brother happy in Molly's love and returns to the lonely forest ranges.



Scene from "Breed of the North" (Lubin).

FAMOUS PLAYERS EXCHANGE ADDS STATES.

So successful has the Famous Players Film Service, of Pittsburgh, been with the Famous Players Features in Western Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio and Kentucky, that it recently applied for and obtained the states of Illinois and Indiana. These states are considered profitable feature territory, and the Famous Players Film Service should more than duplicate its previous success. This concern contemplates establishing western headquarters in Chicago.

WORLD SPECIAL FILMS CORP. EXPANDING.

Within the next week the World Special Films Corporation will have two more branch offices opened—one in Boston, Mass., the other in Detroit, Mich. Mr. Charles Stern, formerly of the Universal, will be in charge of the Boston office and will be located on Boylston Street; and Mr. Dickerson, formerly with the International Feature Film Company, will be at the head of the Detroit office.

Arrangements have been made with W. A. Sherman to manage the Cleveland offices with George Stocton as assistant. Offices have been opened in Room 420, the Columbia Building. Messrs. Sherman & Stocton have both been affiliated with the Lake Shore Film Exchange. Philip Adler, formerly of the Du Quesne Film Exchange, Pittsburgh, has been made manager of the Pittsburgh office.

Owing to the fact that the World Special could not reach the western exhibitor at once, arrangements have been made with the Progressive Motion Picture Company, of San Francisco, to handle California, Oregon, Utah, Nevada, Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, Wyoming and Montana on the "Two Sergeants."

"CAUGHT IN HIS OWN TRAP" (Great Northern).

A motion picture theater, with its full staff of attendants and a brand new film, are the principal ingredients of this attractive comedy-drama. Randal, the manager of the motion picture theater, is enamored of the young woman in the ticket booth, but Oda, the daughter of the proprietor, takes exception to their conduct and complains to her father, Mr. Corna. Randal and his sweetheart become enemies of the young woman and this enmity is extended to Linck, the operator of the motion picture machine, who is in love with Oda. The latter, by the way, is the pianist of the theater, and during an intermission Linck pays her a visit and leaves his booth unprotected. Shortly before his departure the proprietor has intrusted him with a valuable feature reel subject and warns him to be careful of it.

Scene from "Caught In His Own Trap" (Gt. Northern).

During the absence of the operator, Randal enters the operating room and with a knife slashes the film that had been intrusted to the care of the operator. Randal cuts himself accidentally and when the film is placed upon the screen the audience demands its money back on account of its mutilated condition. An investigation follows and both Linck and Randal are called to the manager's office. The cashier and Oda later appear and the climax arrives when Oda explains that it would have been impossible for Linck to have mutilated the film, because he was seated at her side during the intermission. When it is noticed that there is blood on the film and that Randal's hand is bandaged, Manager Corna puts two and two together and dismisses both the manager and the cashier. The comedy-drama should prove of especial interest because of the fact that the interior of a moving picture theater is shown and there is just enough of melodramatic interest to hold concentrated attention.

STATE RIGHT SALES.

State rights on "The Voice of the Wild," the second subject of the Film Releases of America, have been sold as follows: Golden Gate Film Exchange, of Los Angeles and San Francisco; Northwestern Film Exchange, of Portland and Seattle; Famous Players Film Company, of Boston; Weiland Film Co., of Pittsburgh; Electric Theater Supply Co., of Philadelphia.

RECENT SALES OF "RICHARD III."

The Sterling Camera and Film Co. has sold the Great Britain rights for Frederick Warde in "Richard III' to H. Winik, 35 Little Newport Street, London, England; South American rights to Antonio Sanchez, Mexico City, Mexico. Greater New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia and District of Columbia were bought by the Keen-O-Scope Co., 1204 Race Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

ADDRESS OF HELEN GARDNER FEATURES.

State right operators who are interested in the Helen Gardner Picture Players productions are invited to address all communications to the New York sales office, Broadway Film Co., 145 West 45th Street, or The Helgar Corporation, 472 Fulton Street, Brooklyn.

KLEINE-CINES SUBJECT IS PHOTOGRAPHIC GEM.

"The Wheels of Justice," the Kleine-Cines release for Tuesday, October 21, offers many unusual and some original and striking features not often seen in two reel subjects. The plot itself is out of the ordinary.

A rising young novelist is thrown into the river after being shot by a jealous, young and unsuccessful author. The assaulted man's sweetheart, Miss Vincent, is the sister of Frank Vincent, a structural engineer who has just completed the erection of a bridge. The disappearance of the novelist is blamed upon Frank, who fearing trouble owing to the collapse of the bridge, is about to fly the country.

Scene from "Wheels of Justice" (Kleine-Cines).

From such an unusual start the story swings into the heart of Italy. The famous Cines Company never used better judgment in the selection of beautiful exteriors. The watcher is charmed with a succession of quaint and dainty vistas. Also, the picture is remarkable for a feat of daring that will call forth much applause. The above cut of the falling bridge fails to do justice to this extraordinary scene, for in the moving picture, two men are seen to hurtle over the bridge, with the entire structure falling after them. Incidentally, the men are not "prop" dummies and the feat is one of genuine daring well calculated to stir the sluggish blood and make you wonder how they did it.

LUBIN COMEDY CO. GOES SOUTH.

The Lubin Comedy Company, Arthur D. Hotaling, director, left Philadelphia last week for the Jacksonville, Fla., studio, where they will spend the winter. The principal players are Mae Hotely, Hazel Smith, Margaret and Frances Ne Moyer, Julia Calhoun, Jessie Milton, Leola May, Peggy Anderston, Dorothy Betz, Jerry Heverner, Raymond McKee, Garry Hotaling, chief operator, Frank Griffin, James Levering, William Betz, Walter Heires, William Bowers, Neil Morton, Henry Bard, and a host of stage carpenters, camera men, electricians, scene painters and property men. Mr. Hotaling is having lights installed in the studio so that hereafter he can laugh at the rain.

STATE RIGHT PURCHASES.

Encouraged by their success with the program of the Exclusive Supply Corporation in Eastern Pennsylvania and Southern New Jersey, the Electric Theater Supply Company, represented by H. O. Schwalbe, will this week consummate arrangements for the handling of the Exclusive program in their neighboring territory: Delaware, Maryland, District of Columbia and Virginia. This agreement has been prepared by Joseph R. Miles, General Manager of the Exclusive and probably will be signed in New York. J. W. Morgan, of Kansas City, Mo., has entered negotiations for the Exclusive program in his territory.

STREYCKMANS OUT OF PASQUALI AMERICAN CO.

Hector J. Streyckmans, who recently left the Mutual Film Corporation, to organize the Pasquali American Company, has sold his interests in the latter company and is considering other connections. As there is no better informed or more capable motion picture man than Mr. Streyckmans he will soon be placed.

"A DAUGHTER OF THE UNDERWORLD" (Kalem).

The recent action of a great political leader in adopting, as a member of his household, an unfortunate girl of the slums, makes the latest Kalem two-part feature production "A Daughter of the Underworld," of particular interest. This film is scheduled for release on October 22nd.

Like the man in real life, the hero of the Kalem production takes into his own home a young girl whose environment is wholly vicious. By a strange coincidence, "A Daughter of the Underworld" was actually being produced when the newspapers throughout the country blazoned forth the news of the manner in which this leader of his political party was following the precepts of the Great Teacher.

Scene from "A Daughter of the Underworld" (Kalem).

According to the story, the girl, although seventeen, is an accomplished thief. At a Rescue Mission she hears the young minister preach. The man becomes interested in her and takes her into his own home and places her under his mother's care. A climax of unusual power is that in which the girl goes back to the underworld and resumes her life in order to reveal her brother as the man who has committed a murder of which her benefactor is accused. The story throughout is strong and the situations powerful.

IMP EUROPEAN COMPANY IN BERLIN.

The Imp European stock company left Paris for Berlin on September 4, where the third of the international series of motion pictures under Universal auspices will be taken. Leah Baird, William Shay, George Hall and Joe Brandt are in the party.

"BISHOP'S CARRIAGE" INJUNCTION NOTE.

The publicity department of the Famous Players Film Company issues the following statement:

An incomplete report published in a few trade journals tending to imply that the temporary injunction obtained by the Liebler Co. against the film production of "In the Bishop's Carriage" applies to every print of this film produced by the Famous Players Film Company violates the spirit of the writ, as in text and effect the injunction was only designed to prohibit the Famous Players Film Co. from manufacturing, producing, exhibiting, or causing to be manufactured, produced or exhibited any films based on the subject during the pendency of the action, but is not intended to govern, and does in no manner restrict, the exhibition of the prints released before the issuance of the injunction. Exhibitors who have arranged to book this production will not be deterred or molested, and can advertise the production as extensively as they see fit without hindrance or restraint.

KLEINE AFTER PIRATES.

James E. Northmore who was arrested by the Federal authorities for making copies of George Kleine's copyrighted photographs of "Quo Vadis?" and selling them in the open market, was arraigned yesterday in Chicago and bound over to the Federal Grand Jury in one thousand dollars bail. Northmore furnished bail and engaged counsel. Mr. George Kleine and his associates have determined to prove the values of Federal protection in copyright issues and intend to relentlessly pursue all violators. Since George Kleine made his immense success with the Cines production of "Quo Vadis?" there have been several minor attractions started that have taken advantage of his advertising and press notices and have even gone so far as to use his copyright photos and cuts, and in some instances to use his own press matter—misleading the public into the belief that they are presenting the original Astor Theater production.

NOTES OF THE TRADE.

MOTION Pictures of Mayor Gaynor's funeral were shown in the Albambra, Bronx, Orpheum, Keith's and Moss & Brill's Circuits the same night of the funeral, 8:30 p. m. The Commercial Motion Picture Company, of New York, furnished prints to theaters the same day that the funeral was photographed.

A clever love story which is also educational to a large degree is "Through the Sluice Gates," by Phillip Lonergan, a coming Majestic release featuring Wm. Garwood and Belle Bennett in the leading roles. Produced by John Adolphi, this picture shows scenes along the new Los Angeles Aqueduct, that great engineering feat of the Southwest rapidly nearing completion. One of the strongest scenes in the play is a thrilling man hunt in which the unjustly accused hero is aided by his sweetheart in escaping through the sluice gates of the Aqueduct.

Among the sale of Itala features in the week is that of "The War Correspondents," to the Eagle Feature Film Co., of New York, which has purchased the Greater New York, Northern New Jersey and New York State rights.

Adam Kessel, Jr., President of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, became the proud father of a little girl on September 25. There is some talk that she will be named "Domino," after Mr. Kessel's youngest brand of film.

Charles Clary, formerly leading man at the Selig Plant, in Chicago, who made his first appearance under the auspices of the Selig Polyscope Company, in picture plays in Chicago, has, after several years' absence, gone back to that company.

Architects planning the beautiful de luxe house which George Kleine and several prominent New Yorkers will build on 42nd Street, near Broadway, New York, are adding many unusual features in the hope of erecting a house that will have no equal in the country.. Built especially for pictures, a number of expensive ideas have been added in the hope of making the house distinctive and unusual.

* * *

Ed. J. Brady, who has joined Wallace Reid's company, is well known on the vaudeville circuits both for his Jewish impersonations and "rag" singing. Following considerable experience with the Powers, Vitagraph, Republic and Kay-Bee companies, he joined the Universal.

Miss Ida Lewis and Joseph P. Swickard have been engaged to play characters in the "Ricketts" branch of the Flying "A" company in California. Both have had extensive experience on the legitimate stage and in pictures and their work on the screen is highly commendable.

Charles Dickson, author of "The Three Twins" and other well known stage successes, will be seen in "The Buffer," Reliance release for October 6th. "The Buffer," which Charles Dickson wrote and used as a starring vehicle in vaudeville, makes a splendid comedy reel, having been staged under the author's personal direction.

"Ketcham & Killem," obviously a comedy, in one reel, featuring Fred Mace, and having as many laughs in it as a porcupine has quills, will soon be released by the Apollo, to add to the gaiety of nations. The point on which the fun revolves, and on "ball" bearings, too, for there's a "gun" used in the story, is the subscription list of the "Modern Magazine."

* * *

Just prior to leaving Paris, Director Brenon, of the Imp European Stock Company, put on a single reel picture of great novelty called "The Child Stealers of Paris." The Latin Quarter of Paris and the famous Boulevards are the environment of this absorbing film-drama.

Mr. Arthur Ashley was a professional stock actor in several stock companies before joining the Vitagraph company. Mr. Ashley has been with the Vitagraph about six months and together with Miss Florence Dyer, who was formerly on the stage, takes the leading part in "Two Aristocratic Penitents," which is to be released with "Wild Beasts At Large," as a special exclusive General Film release.

Joseph Spero, recently appointed a district manager for Warner's Features, Inc., has severed all his connections with the Warner organization. No successor has been appointed up to the present time.

Adolph Zukor, President of the Famous Players Film Co., who has been making a two-months' tour of Europe in the interests of his company, reports from abroad that foreign conditions are very favorable to American film of the higher standard. Mr. Zukor has traveled through England, France and Germany, spreading the gospel of better pictures and higher standards.

Miss Florence Gribbon, of the Sales Company fame, has succeeded Mr. J. C. Epping as manager of the New Rochelle combined shipping department of the Thanhouser, Reliance, Majestic and other Mutual producing companies. Mr. Epping goes to Los Angeles as business manager of the Majestic Studios there. Miss Gribbon is one of the youngest business women in the film game and served with Miles Brothers, Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company and Film Supply Company before becoming the assistant at New Rochelle to the man whom she succeeds in the management of the big shipping office.

George Ellis, chief electrician of the Pilot Company, is attending to duties with the aid of crutches, which is no easy matter. Ellis, who was (he is not now) a motorcycle enthusiast was run down by an auto. For two weeks he lay in bed with a broken ankle, and several severe cuts and bruises. Ellis wants to sell his motorcycle.

One of the most spectacular two-reel subjects ever made by Cines is promised for early release in a remarkable adventure story where many of the scenes were made some fifteen feet under water around the sunken hulk of a sea-going vessel. The attempt to photograph under water has frequently been made by other companies with indifferent results. However, the Cines Company secured some splendid negative in this way, due probably, very largely, to the remarkably clear water of the Italian Coast. The two divers are plainly seen walking about among the sea-weed and peculiar ocean vegetation.

Thomas W. Ross, who was starred in the original production of "Checkers," has been engaged by the All Star Feature Corporation to play the role he originally created in the photoplay production of "Checkers," which is now under way. This production will be made under the stage direction of Augustus Thomas, who acts as general director of productions of the All Star Feature Corporation.

On a recent visit to San Francisco, Thomas H. Ince, general manager of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, secured a valuable acquisition to the motion picture stage. Through a flattering offer he has succeeded in luring from the fold of the legitimate the clever character actor Walter Belasco, brother of David Belasco.

"Making Pig Iron" is a recent American production of much interest. The soft glow of the natural heat of the molten metal as it is issued from furnace to ladle, and passes on from one process to another lends a certain weirdness to the scenes that is decidedly acceptable and pleasing. The subject is devoid of dry and technical matter and will be especially well received by schools and manual training institutions as well as the general public. It will be released with a good comedy subject, "Courage of Sorts," on October 13.

Ned Finley, James Morrison, Harry Northrup, Edith Storey, Arthur Ashley, Mrs. Storey, Mrs. S. F. Clinton, Temple Carr, Logan Paull, Florence Klots and Jack Harvey, the owner of Shep, the Vitagraph dog, who has made good and appears in "Heartbroken Shep" and several other Vitagraph pictures, are going to North Carolina to produce a picture similar to "The Strength of Man." Mr. Finley took the lead in "The Strength of Man." He will take the lead and direct this coming production. The company expects to be gone about three weeks, starting about October 1.

What promises to be a treat extraordinary is a comedy, "The Boob's Dream Girl," featuring Robert Leonard and Margarita Fischer. Bob will be seen as the Boob and Miss Fischer will play the Dream Girl.

CINCINNATI.

ON Tuesday, September 9, the Cincinnati branch of the Exhibitors' League of America met in the Sinton Hotel, and matters of importance were brought up for discussion, but according to President Dinglestedt, no formal action was taken on any of the propositions discussed. President Dinglestedt intimated that several matters are held in abeyance which, when made public, will cause much interest in the local motion picture field.

To prevent the closing of small motion picture theaters after the censorship law becomes effective November 4, the State Motion Picture Censor Board decided Tuesday, September 10, to begin immediately the censoring of films now on hand in the different branch exchanges. Thus a supply of censored films will be insured for theaters which use films from 30 to 120 days old. The three board members will do this work. Harry Vestal will go to Cleveland, J. B. Maddox to Cincinnati and Mrs. Maude M. Miller will remain in Columbus. When the law becomes effective all films will be sent here for approval of the entire board. Representatives of New York, Pittsburgh, Cleveland and Cincinnati, Detroit and Indianapolis film companies were present at the board's meeting on September 9, in Columbus.

The Commercial Tribune on September 11 devoted a considerable amount of space to the return engagement of the famous photoplay, "Quo Vadis?" which started a week's engagement at Music Hall, Sunday, Sept. 14. "Quo Vadis?" was recently exhibited at B. F. Keith's Theater and the demand for admission was so great that thousands were turned away and a return engagement was necessary. Music Hall was selected as the place for the exhibition of the picture, because of its spacious auditorium.

Heart disease caused the death of Morris Jacobsen, aged 52, proprietor of the Elder Moving Picture Theater, on Wednesday, Sept. 10.

Discontent reigns supreme among the many moving picture show proprietors who were present at a meeting of the Ways and Means Committee of Council September 12 when a hearing was had before that body on the proposed ordinance to restrict the moving picture licensed operators of the city. The meeting became enlivened when Chairman John Weld Peck, of the Committee, attempted to curtail the talk of Attorney Amos Foster, acting for the picture show operators. Chairman Peck told Mr. Foster his time for discussion was exhausted. Attorney Foster responded that it was a public meeting upon a public question and that he would talk as long as he chose. He also said that if the chairman desired him to cease, he could order him to quit the floor. This Chairman Peck did not do. The result of the hearing was that the committee action be laid over until the next meeting, pending the gathering of additional information. Over one hundred picture show owners were present at the meeting. At the close of the meeting Chairman Peck put the boot to President M. A. Neff, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, when he refused him the privilege of the floor. Mr. Neff turned away from the committee table, saying that he had understood he had been invited to discuss the proposed changes in the present ordinance and that as a citizen of the city he ought to have the right to address the committee. Mr. Peck laughed. Attorney Foster charged that the measure will take the control of the moving picture houses out of the hands of the owners and place it in the possession of the employees. He also insinuated that the measure is purely political and is intended to draw votes during the coming campaign. He said that the appointment of a new commission will place political jobs in the hands of administration bosses. When Attorney Foster declared that the Unions are back of the proposed measure, Chairman Peck rapped on the table and declared that he was not the sponsor of the proposed measure, but that it came from the city solicitor's office and that the Unions were not back of it. Mr. Foster also said that Indianapolis, Spokane, and Seattle had refused similar ordinances. He made the charge that the local license board has shown favoritism in examinations, and that none but Union men could pass the lists offered by the city board. This brought A. G. Sturdevant, electrical inspector of the Building Commissioner's office, to his feet with a denial of the allegation. When asked to explain why out of fifteen applicants only four passed and that some of the failures were experienced operators, Mr. Sturdevant said he could not explain. The result of the meeting aroused much discontent among the many show owners who were present. Chairman Peck refused to say whether or not the proposed ordinance would go before council at its next meeting.

On September 8 the Moving Picture Censor Board decided at a meeting that portrayal of murders, suicides and other harrowing scenes that are liable to have a bad effect on the minds of the young, will not be thrown on the canvas of moving picture shows in Ohio when the law becomes effective November 4.

Troubles at the Victor picture show in Brighton, a suburb of Cincinnati, on September 9, because of the employment of non-Union musicians, took an acute turn when Union men appeared at various times carrying banners announcing that the house was not "Union." Trouble started when the first man appeared. City patrolmen placed him under arrest. The sign he carried was sent to the station house. The emblem was hardly out of sight when another man bearing the same kind of banner was stopped and cited to appear in court. A half hour later another man appeared carrying a third banner, the duplicate of the others. When patrolmen took this banner, a crowd gathered. The people hooted the officers and called to the carrier of the emblem to keep it and not surrender it at any cost. Police reinforcements quieted the crowd that had assumed great proportions. "FOXIE."

PHILADELPHIA.

THE Wayne Palace Theater was opened on Sept. 8, and throughout the entire evening the house was packed to capacity. The owner, Mr. F. Shilling, has spared no expense in making this theater one of the best in the northwest section. With a seating capacity of 750 and plenty of lobby room, the theater, which is located in one of the best paying sections of the city, should be made a great success. The two Power's 6 A machines were bought of the Calehuff Supply Company, Inc.

The Independent Film Company has moved into its new quarters at 804 Vine Street, and this thriving concern, under the management of George W. Bradenburgh, is due to become one of the big factors in the life of the trade in Philadelphia.

Robert Hamilton is building a new picture theater at Fifty-third Street and Lansdowne Avenue at a cost of $10,000.

After having spent several weeks in New York City looking over the latest features, H. B. Reynolds has returned to Philadelphia. A number of new features were brought back by him which promise to make a hit with the local exhibitors.

Alterations which will greatly improve the theater of C. Chapman at Tacony and Orthodox Streets are being made at the present time at a cost of $2,000.

E. Latisch, formerly connected with several of the feature houses of this city, is now in Syracuse, N. Y. He expects to return to this city within a few weeks to enter the film business again.

Application is being made by Louis B. Mayer, N. A. Haley, Samuel Jones and E. J. Pershing for a charter for an intended corporation to be known as the Louis B. Mayer Company of Pennsylvania. The object of the new corporation is to own and operate all kinds of theaters and amusements.

It has been announced that Chris S. Hand of Ocean City, N. J., will be a candidate for Assembly on the Republican ticket of New Jersey.

Marion Leonard, in "Those Who Live in Glass Houses" and "On the Trail of the Spider Gang," is proving to be one of the biggest hits in the picture world of the season. These plays are both booked solidly by the National Feature Film Company for the next two months.

The Ideal Amusement Company has granted a contract for the erection of a new theater at Sixth and Jackson Streets which will be completed in the early winter.

Moving pictures have been adopted as sermons by the Rev. Dr. Charles E. McClellan, of the Fairhill Baptist Church, and feature men who have appropriate subjects should get in touch with the progressive minister.

The Lincoln Theater, under the management of Mr. Pollon and his untiring efforts to give the people who patronize his show the very best possible service, has built up a reputation which is known all over the city. Several improvements have been made to the interior of the house, while the outside has been renovated and two large arc lights placed in position in front of the theater.

B. A. and H. H. Weaver, of Mountoursville, Pa., are the owners of a theater which is under construction at that place. The exterior of the theater will be finished in brick bluestone terra cotta and ornamental stucco work, and with the interior furnishings will cost over $9,000.

Charles Streamer, manager of several up-state theaters and exchanges, was in Philadelphia last week and purchased a number of features.

At the last election of officers for the Moving Picture Operators' Union in this city, the following were elected to serve for one term of office: President, Lew Krause; vice-president, P. F. Marx, W. Simms, financial secretary; T. Lucchese, treasurer, and Bob Taylor, business agent.

The Fairmount Theater and the Airdome, operated by J. Goodman, had exceptionally heavy patronage with the feature, "Resurrection." E. W. Booth, owner of the film, reports steady booking with very few open dates.

Charles Campbell, road representative of the American Features, is now on a tour of the state, and word received from him is to the effect that exhibitors are booking without much solicitation.

T. W. Williams, of the Exclusive Supply Company, has opened a suite of offices in the Abott Building, where he will handle a line of license films as well as general supplies for the exhibitor.

W. C. Karrer, of the State Rights Film Company, has sold the feature, "The Black Snake," to the Key-O-Scope Company, which will fill all bookings.

Edward Kraupa and Carl Schwartz have formed a partnership under the name of the Monarch Feature Film Company, with offices at Ninth and Race Streets, and will handle a line of imported feature films, for which they will be the sole agents in the United States and Canada. Already a large number of foreign films has been received, and with the arrival of each vessel from a foreign port additional features are being brought in. Mr. Schwartz is formerly of the Interstate Film Company and is one of the most experienced men in the business. Mr. Kraupa also enjoys the same distinction. CONGDON.

INDIANAPOLIS.

A REORGANIZATION of the Indiana Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, under the name of the Indiana Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association, took place at a meeting held at the Denison Hotel in Indianapolis, on September 10. The reorganization took place because the old organization was identified with the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. The Indiana association will not be affiliated with any national association. There is no change in the officers, who are: President, J. M. Rhodes, Indianapolis; vice-president, F. J. Rembusch, Shelbyville; secretary-treasurer, A. C. Zaring, Indianapolis. M. A. Neff, of Cincinnati, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, has called a meeting to be held at the Severin Hotel, Indianapolis, on September 30, for the purpose of reorganization of a state association to be affiliated with the national association. Mr. Neff was in Indianapolis recently arranging for the meeting. The Indiana Motion Picture Exhibitors' League was opposed to Mr. Neff's election at the National Convention, held in New York City in July, and withdrew from the convention, when, they say, there was evidence of a "frame up" to re-elect Mr. Neff. The Indiana association was the guest of the Lyric Theater during its meeting September 10.

Operators of some of the downtown motion picture houses in Indianapolis have been on strike for some time. They are demanding a wage scale of from $19 to $21 a week for day work and from $21 to $23 a week for night work, and for shorter hours. For a time the strikers distributed cards in front of the picture houses asking people not to attend because non-Union operators were employed. This was stopped when some of the strikers were arrested.

Cases filed against the owners of fourteen motion picture houses in Indianapolis who were arrested for not filing with the county clerk their own names and the names under which they are operating their places, have been dismissed. Those arrested complied with the law when their notice was called to the matter. The cases were against the owners of the Scenic, North Star, Iris, Vandetta, Eureka, Brookside, My, Virginia, Garden, Pastime, Alcazar, Imperial, West Side and June theaters.

Edward G. Sourbier has opened the Palms, a new picture house at Illinois and Wabash Streets, in Indianapolis. The house was erected by Mr. Sourbier at a cost of $16,000 and is next door to the Indianapolis Traction and Terminal station, where all of the interurban cars entering the city arrive and depart. The new house has a seating capacity of 360 and is tastefully finished in ivory and tan. Mr. Sourbier also is proprietor of the Oriental, with a seating capacity of 1,100, in South Meridian Street. CUMMINS.

IOWA.

THE opening of the Majestic Theater at Des Moines, on September 14, as an exclusive photoplay house, was announced by Elbert & Getchell. This will be made possible by the new Empress, which will take care of the vaudeville shows. The Majestic will show first-run Licensed pictures. A new two-manual pipe organ from the William Scheulke factory at Chicago, has been installed.

The city council at Des Moines may be asked to amend the moving picture theater ordinance which provides that photoplay houses can only be erected on corners. The movement is credited to promoters of some outlying houses, who have sites which they declare will admit of side exits. Harry McNutt, fire marshal, is reported favorable to the change, provided the theaters comply with all other restrictions.

Charles Palmer has sold the Crystal Theater, at Moulton, to W. H. Wright, of Avoca.

George Ogden has sold his picture show at Elgin to Clifton Christ, and with his family, will remove to Florida. Sunday evening shows were contemplated by the new proprietor.

John A. Meadows and son Roy, of Spencer, have purchased a photoplay house at Sioux Rapids.

Lemen & DeBaggio, of Colfax, are now owners of the Palace, at Adel.

John Billo has sold the Novelty Theater, at Avoca, to Simon Beine, owner of the Majestic.

Loren Arbengust and Ross Pratt, have purchased the Gem Theater, at Independence, from Joy Bradley.

R. V. Stephens has sold his interest in the Electric theater, at Morning Sun, to C. A. Peterson. The place is now under the management of Yohe & Peterson, S. A. Yohe retaining his interest.

H. H. Ling is erecting a building at Newell, to be used for a picture show.

DICK EDMONDSON controls fourteen European brands for the American market. Each week he selects the best three. In choosing one we are influenced by these points:

Are they suitable for American eyes?

Can the Exchange-man make money by renting them?

Can the Exhibitor make money by showing them?

Will the spectator be pleased and come back for more?

These questions have affirmatively, emphatically, been answered in the choosing of

THE FIANCEE AND THE FAIRY (Oct. 13).—John Thorpe and his wife, people of once large means, are very desirous of bringing about a marriage between their daughter, Helen, and a young millionaire named Morton. The demands of creditors press heavily upon the much distressed Mr. Thorpe, and in response to his earnest pleas his daughter consents to the engagement. The Mortons call on the Thorpes to ratify the engagement, and invite them to a sumptuous betrothal party at their magnificent home. At the outset of this function, Helen begins to regret the engagement. While showing the Thorpes through the mansion they enter the picture gallery, and Helen is deeply attracted to a portrait, which she learns is that of her fiance's grandfather. Later in the evening young Tom Thorpe engages in singing and dancing with some of the younger people. Helen steals away into the picture gallery and sits looking at the old portrait, which presents her ideal of a lover. She talks to the portrait. "Oh, why can't some good fairy send me a lover like you?" A fairy does appear and in response to the statement of her grievances, the fairy endows Helen with two wishes—the first wish will bring you your ideal lover, the second one will send him away. The fairy fades away. Helen calls for her ideal lover, and the picture steps from its frame. The new lover becomes very ardent in his protestation of affection, and his manner of doing it is so courtly and refined, that she falls completely under his influence. She becomes cold and indifferent toward Harry in spite of the protests of her parents. He is particularly snobbish to Harry, calls attention to his many unrefined habits and is disagreeable to him. Harry, however, in his good-natured way, bides his time and waits for the finality. The picture lover complains of the abandon of modern social ways, of the glaring vulgarity in dress, and of the dangerous liberties permitted young women. Disillusioned, she makes the second wish given her by the fairy and the picture lover is paint and canvas again. The fairy appears again, reads Helen the moral of the story, "let well enough alone" and she permits Harry to take her in his arms.

A DEAL IN OIL (Oct. 14).—Harry Montague, son of wealthy parents, has two prime pastimes: one is driving his motorcar at unlawful speed and the other ordering clothes for his dad to pay for. One day while driving he passes a tennis lawn and sees his sweetheart among the players. A ball jumps the fence and bounces toward Harry. He secures the ball and Ethel comes up to claim it. The young rich man tries to hold her in conversation, but she begins to criticise him on his "flashy" clothes and runs away. Harry is disappointed and returns home to dress in less conspicuous clothes. Again he starts out and is more successful. Ethel's horse takes fright and bolts. Harry's speed comes in handy; he stops the frightened animal, rescues the girl and restores her safe and sound to her father's arms. He asks her father for the hand of his daughter; but Mr. Hammond tells Harry to wait. The young lover, disappointed again, seeks his best friend—the car—but his best friend goes back on him. It breaks down and skids into a ditch. Harry notes the fact that the mud in the ditch discloses oil. Ethel's father comes along and finds Harry under his car and covered with oily mud. The young man sees that he has discovered a fortune and immediately gets in touch with the farmer, who owns the ditch and agrees to furnish the money to bore for oil, the two to be partners in the result. Ethel's father is left out of the deal and again puts a veto on Harry's wooing. The oil well is developed, but the business is too dirty for Harry's liking. He sells out to Mr. Hammond and while the latter and the farmer are closing the deal of partnership, the lovers mount the car and speed away into the dim distance to talk over another partnership.

THE TAKING OF RATTLESNAKE BILL (Special—2 parts—Oct. 16).—Rattlesnake Bill is a daring outlaw who has for a long time successfully evaded capture. Sheriff Granger has sworn to get Bill, who, hearing this, rides into town, holds up the sheriff himself, and makes good his escape. The sheriff's little girl, left motherless, is being sent to him from the East, and is the only passenger on the stagecoach. Dan, the stage driver, is half drunk, and when he stops to make some repairs to his harness he does not observe that the child gets out of the coach and drives off without her.

Bill finds the child almost dead from thirst and exhaustion. He takes her to his cabin. He realizes that the child is dangerously ill and determines to secure a doctor. He goes to the town and induces a physician to return with him. In his haste, Bill neglects his usual precautions and is seen by the sheriff. The physician does all that is possible for the child and leaves her in Bill's care, telling him that the child only needs sleep, but that she must sleep until she awakens naturally and that a violent awakening would prove fatal. The doctor on his way to town meets the sheriff, but the doctor refuses to give any information. When the sheriff reaches the hidden cabin, he fails to take Bill by surprise, and Bill gets the drop on the officer, but, thinking of the child, does not shoot. The sheriff refuses to be driven off, gamely declaring he will risk Bill's missing one shot, and prepares to give battle. Bill quietly surrenders. The sheriff discovers that it is his own child that Bill has saved, and though filled with gratitude, does not dream of not doing his official duty nor does Bill expect him to fail therein. The two men sit for long hours waiting for the child to wake, which she at length does. By Indian smoke signals the sheriff has called his deputies, who, in due course, arrive and take Bill away.

THE MATE OF THE SCHOONER "SADIE" (Oct. 17).—Lute Drew, mate of the schooner "Sadie," is in love with Beth Ross, daughter of John Ross, the captain. Lute is a fine-looking boy with a sweet, clean disposition. His father, also a sailor, was a man who drank heavily. Liquor crazed him and while threatening to strike Lute's mother in one of his fits of passion, the father dropped dead. With the horrible picture always before him, Lute consistently refuses to touch liquor. Before starting on a voyage, Lute visits Beth. There it is decided that Lute and Beth shall be married after the coming voyages. In honor of the event, Capt. Ross produces a bottle of liquor and proposes that they drink a toast to the bride-elect. The curse of Lute's father is not known to Capt. Ross and Beth. Lute is afraid to drink the toast, but rather than have his loyalty to Beth questioned, drains the glass. Leaving the house to round up the crew, Lute finds himself in torment. He tries to pass a saloon, struggles with the effect of the toast and loses. He goes into the saloon and a few drinks craze him. Going to the schooner in this condition Lute runs across Capt. Ross, grossly insults him and is promptly knocked down by the captain. Enraged, Lute plunges for Capt. Ross, but is arrested before doing any damage. On the way to the jail, Lute breaks away from the officers and after a spirited chase eludes them, jumping into the channel and swimming to the schooner, which is just working out from the docks. Lute clambers aboard without attracting attention and conceals himself in the captain's cabin. He breaks open the medicine chest and drinks a bottle of liquor he finds there. Lute waits until the schooner is at sea, then lurches from his hiding-place and attacks Capt. Ross who is at the wheel. The crew, scenting trouble, comes on Lute, and the unconscious captain. Lute escapes and runs the length of the ship and climbs out on the bowsprit. There he defies the crew to capture him. When two members of the crew start for him, he stands on the slender footing, lurching, ready for the attack. His foot slips, he falls into the sea and is drowned.

A SLEEPY ROMANCE (Oct. 18).—Silas Hicks is one of those boobs, who find that the most pleasure in life is to sleep. He has a sweetheart, Bess Brown. He also has a rival in Tom Lusk. Si seems to be the favored one by Bess. The wedding day arrives and Si's mother makes preparation for the function. Friends are invited and everyone seems to take a living interest in the affair, but Si, is continually falling asleep. His rival, Tom, calls and finds Si on the verge of another nap. Tom makes the best of the situation by being attentive to Bess. The hour of the wedding arrives. The minister and the guests have arrived, but Si does not show up, he having fallen asleep as he went to dress for the ceremony. Bess starts to cry and leaves the room. Tom follows and persuades her to marry him. She consents; they return to the parlor and the knot is tied. The boys wondering where Si is go to hunt for him. They find him asleep in his room. The blowing of their horns wakes him up and he is informed that his girl has married Tom. He yawns, stretches and says, "Well, in that case, I will finish my sleep."

THE HIGHEST BIDDER (Oct. 18).—Tom Denton is in love with Margie Maynard, who works for his father as a stenographer. Old man Denton catches them kissing and takes Tom in his private office and shows him his will, in which Tom becomes heir only on condition that he marry his father's choice. Tom replies by again kissing Margie. Then Tom receives a letter that his aunt is dead and he inherits $30,000 if he will marry her choice. Tom's mother receives a letter that if Tom marries Martha Sprague he inherits $50,000, but Tom sticks to Margie, and he and Margie are ordered out of the office. Before they leave the office a messenger brings a telegram saying that Margie has inherited about a half million, so Tom marries the highest bidder after all.

MELIES.

CAST AMID BOOMERANG THROWERS (Oct. 9).—One hundred years ago a sailor is cast away on the Australian coast, reaching shore on a raft. Almost the only thing left to him is a chart in a thin case. When attacked by natives he uses this as a weapon, and the savages shrink away in terror, thinking the object to possess some evil power. The sailor makes full use of this superstitious dread to save his life. He is befriended by a native boy, who reveals to him a hidden water hole and gets him food. But this brings on the fierce enmity of his own people, and he is eventually killed when showing the sailor a place where alluvial gold could be picked up. The sailor, unable now without the boy's help to find nourishment, dies, but writes on the chart with his blood where the gold exists.

Fifty years later the skeleton of the sailor is found hugging the chart case. The natives have still preserved their superstitious fear and shunned the spot as accursed. Two prospectors and a woman, wife of one of the men, are the discoverers of the skeleton. They read the words on the chart and find the gold deposit. Attacked by the natives, the woman remembers the words on the chart which told of its powerful influence over the aboriginals' minds. Thus she saves the party's lives. She also rides to mining headquarters to register the claim, escaping the savages, and there follows a rush of miners to the golden gully before which the black tribesmen fade away.

EDISON.

MR. TOOTS' TOOTH (Oct. 1).—Mr. Toots had a toothache. Toots' toothache was a jumping toothache. Every time his tooth started to jump, Toots started instantaneously for the dentist's. You cannot temporize with a jumping toothache. Oddly enough, just as soon as Toots reached the dentist's he invariably discovered that his toothache had disappeared. Once he got as far as the dentist's chair. The dentist attempted to make a primary investigation of the tooth with an instrument of a peculiarly savage appearance, and Toots assured him that it was all a mistake. One of the easiest things people do is suggesting. All of Toots's friends took a hand at curing the painful tooth. Acting on their advise he tried various infallible patent "soothers" and toothache candies. At his office business was entirely suspended and Mr. Toots' clerks and stenographers organized themselves into a relief department. They tied a string around the afflicted tooth and attempted to fasten the other end of the string to a door. Mr. Toots objected strenuously. One of the clerks tied the end of the string around a heavy book and attempted to drop the book out of the window. Pale with terror, Toots caught the book just in time. A moment later, angered beyond endurance by the continued suggestions, he caught a book up from his desk and threw it at one of his clerks. It was the book with the string tied to it. The string was still tied to his tooth. Hence his tooth followed the book.

DAMASCUS AND THE RUINS OF BAALBEK (Oct. 1).—"Man can enter into paradise only once," said Mahomet, "and what desire shall I have for the paradise of the hereafter, if I look longer upon this paradise on earth?"

It is true that Damascus may not meet with the entire approval of our Western ideas as an abode of the blest, but none the less, we must admit that it is a pleasant place to look upon. The city itself is no wayside hamlet. It is a thriving metropolis sending forth its manifold productions to the ends of the earth. After we have had a glimpse of the points of interest about the city—Mt. Lebanon, the Abana River, the "Street called Straight," etc.—and have watched the antiquated methods employed in making rope, hammering brass and inlaying furniture, we turn to another city which is a decided contrast to busy Damascus. Baalbek, the ancient Heliopolis of the Romans, at one time rivalled Damascus in splendor and importance. Today, it is a melancholy ruin—a waste of graceful columns and fallen pediments gleaming in the light of a sun which shall never rise again on the grandeurs of the old days.

WHY GIRLS LEAVE HOME (2 parts—Oct. 3).—The story hinges about a minister who receives a pamphlet announcing that the melodrama "Why Girls Leave Home," is to be produced at the local theater. Stirred by the danger to his flock from so pernicious an influence, he prepares a vigorous sermon against the play. In order to make his sermon particularly apt, he decides that he must see the play himself, and so he steals secretly from home on the night of the performance. His daughter, stenographer and cook arrive at the same conclusion and also go to the performance with their respective young men. The simultaneous home-coming of these seven people after the play, produces an extremely amusing situation which is culminated by the arrival of an usher with the minister's coat.

THE CONTENTS OF THE SUITCASE (Oct. 4).—When Harry Mayhew stepped off the train at Hammondsville, there was nobody at the station to meet him. Mayhew decided to walk the four miles to the Hammond house, and accordingly set out over the hills. After wandering about for some time, Mayhew drifted into a camp of moon-

"The Last Days of Pompeii"

In three acts of two parts each!

SEARCH the literature of Ages—from the papyrus of Egypt to the modern novel—from Aristotle to Zola—and find, if you can, a fiction masterpiece so well adapted to the motion picture.

We promise you the steady undercurrent of a story sublime—we promise you the thrills of spectacular scenes—the panic of a multitude—the annihilation of a great and powerful city—the swirl and rush of adventure—and all staged amid settings of transcendent beauty.

"THE LAST DAYS OF POMPEII" was made at Pompeii and Turin, Italy—practically on the site of the once gay and populous Pompeii—the home of the idler and the dreamer. A picture made at fabulous cost, employing 4,000 people in the making—months of time—and the entire resources of one of the world's greatest studios.

shiners. The gentle mountaineers instantly held him up at the points of their guns. Robinetta, the daughter of the chief of the gang, promised to help him out of his difficulty, and accordingly stole away from the camp and hurried across the hills to the Hammond house. While she was gone, Mayhew discovered to his astonishment that the suitcase he carried was not his own. Opening it, he found it packed with bank notes of large denomination. Jared Gale, Robinetta's father, wrenched the suitcase out of his hands, and plunged into the woods. A little later the sheriff and his posse surprised the gang of moonshiners and took their prisoners and the jubilant Mayhew back to the Hammond's house. Shortly after Mayhew left the train a tall, dark fellow with shifting eyes, who sat in the seat behind him, discovered that Mayhew had taken the wrong suitcase. Swinging off the rapidly moving train he walked back to Hammondsville and set out for the Hammond's followed by a quiet unobtrusive man who had been hanging about the station for some days. The tall dark man burst in suddenly on the group at the Hammonds' veranda, and demanded his suitcase. Just as he laid his hands upon it, the man who had followed him, snapped a pair of handcuffs on his wrist. "Counterfeiter!" he explained shortly to the astonished group. Since the money he had stolen was really worthless, Robinetta's father was allowed to go free, and Mayhew settled down on his visit to the Hammonds firmly convinced that it is the unexpected that always happens.

A SHORT LIFE AND A MERRY ONE (Oct. 6).—A ragged tramp, wandering about the countryside, came upon a scarecrow in a corn field. "That's the sort of job I'd like to have," he remarked enviously. "Just stand still all day, and look ugly at the crows." After which lofty observation, the tramp threw himself down and fell asleep. A mischievous imp, hearing the tramp's words, decided to take him seriously. Accordingly he brought the scarecrow to life and put the tramp in his place. He gave the astonished scarecrow his magic wand, told him that he could bring inanimate objects to life or restore them to their original condition at will with it, and warned him that his life would cease when the wand left his hand. The delighted scarecrow immediately set out for the city. Coming across another scarecrow on the way, he touched him with the wand, and brought him to life. A little later, he animated the dummy in front of a clothing store. The two scarecrows and the dummy were simultaneously struck with the charm of a beautiful young lady of wax in a modiste's window. The first scarecrow brought her to life, and because he feared the dummy would become a dangerous rival, forced him to take the young lady's place in the window. More of the same happened before the tramp woke up.

BIRDS OF THE SOUTHERN SEA COAST (Oct. 6).—The alarming decrease which has taken place of late years in the numbers of the sea-fowl which breed on our Southern shores gives a peculiar interest to this film. The senseless slaughter of thousands of beautiful herons and egrets for the purpose of gratifying the vain desires of a number of unthinking women, has reached the stage of a national disgrace. Popular opinion has been awakened of late years to the necessity of limiting the depredations of unscrupulous plume hunters, and much good has resulted from protective legislation. There is still, however, much to be done and it is our hope that this film may serve to help this movement along, by giving the public an intimate view into the lives and habits of several varieties of these beautiful birds.

Most of the sea-fowl pictures have been taken in the neighborhood of Secessionville, S. C. Large nesting colonies of Snowy, Louisiana and Little Blue Herons are shown, and closer views give us an insight into the daily habits of the birds, and how they raise and care for their young.

Besides the three varieties of Herons, a picture is shown of a large colony of Terns on Vessel Reef in Bull's Bay, S. C. These trim, gull-like birds are pictures of grace and beauty in the air, and the sight of hundreds of them rising from the ground at once is very impressive.

A WILFUL COLLEEN'S WAY (Oct. 7).—In all County Galway there was none could stand against Terence O'Flynn whether it was in running, in wrestling or in throwing the great stone. Straight he was and strong and wurra but it was the cold bold eyes he had when danger came in his way, but Terence came to his end through a woman. Eileen O'Moore was her name. It was Terence held first place in her heart. For his part Terence loved the little shoes of her more than all the world. The squire first caused trouble between them. When Terence learned that the squire was hanging about Eileen, he spoke bitterly to her. And then, on that very day, she danced with the squire on the green, and neither eye nor ear had she for poor Terence. Terence went out with the fishing fleet. So soon as he was gone, Eileen was sorry and went to the little church to pray he might come back. Terence came back to Eileen. He came drifting on the top of the big waves with a broken oar in his hands and seaweed in his eyes. They buried him on the beach where his body landed, and no kind word was spoken that day to Eileen O'Moore.

BOY WANTED (Oct. 8).—When a cradle arrived at the Powell's house one morning, Bobbie was deeply interested. Bobbie was six years old. The nurse and his father assured him that the cradle was not for him, and told him the beautiful old story about the stork who brings little children to deserving homes. Bobbie was much impressed. He wanted a brother, and he intended to have one. That afternoon while walking down town with his nurse, Bobbie observed a sign "Boy Wanted" in the window of a store. Bobbie went home, inveigled some money out of his father, returned to the shop and bought the "Boy Wanted" sign. That night, he slipped out of his room and nailed the sign securely to a post on the front porch. Next morning Bobbie was not at all surprised when they informed him that he had a baby brother. He inspected the infant carefully when it was shown to him. He informed his astonished father that he was responsible for the baby being a boy and led him out to see the sign. They arrived on the front porch just in time to assure an early applicant for the position that no more boys were wanted just at present.

THE PINK GRANITE INDUSTRY AT MILFORD, MASSACHUSETTS (Oct. 8).—A carefully planned film that is admirably suited to educational purposes. The whole life-story of the granite block is illustrated and particular pains have been taken to make each step clear to the observer's mind.

IN THE SHADOW OF THE MOUNTAINS (Oct. 10).—George Foster, ruined by a drop in the stock market, finds that of all his fair weather friends, only one will stick by him in the hour of his greatest need. This one friend, Griscombe, gives Foster a thousand dollars and advises him to go West and begin his life anew. Foster takes the money and advice and sets out for the Rocky Mountains with his valet Hopkins. In Canyonville, Foster earns the gratitude of Loco Holmes, an eccentric old man, by saving him from a rough crowd in a saloon. Loco Holmes takes Foster into partnership with remarkably successful results.

To Foster a far harder blow than losing his money has been the fact that Mary Livingstone, the girl he was engaged to, refused to have anything more to do with him when she discovered he was a poor man. In Alice Holmes, Loco's daughter, the young man finds something that was lacking in the mercenary Miss Livingstone. The mine soon shows prospects of being enormously valuable. Foster goes East to raise capital. His friends sneer openly at his story of the mine's richness and refuse to risk any money on the venture. Foster inserts a typical "get rich quick" advertisement in the newspapers. Results are instantaneous and astounding. Foster is almost overwhelmed by the floods of money which pour in. Federal authorities arrest Foster for illegally using the mails to promote a worthless mine, but Loco Holmes, and Alice arrive just in time to disprove this accusation by showing a valiseload of nuggets lately taken from the mine. Foster shuns the repentant and affectionate Miss Livingstone, and returns to the West with Alice Holmes.

THE GIRL AND THE OUTLAW (Oct. 11).—Sheriff Morton receives word that Jim Dawson, wanted for the shooting of Hank Smith, is at large somewhere in the woods nearby. The sheriff immediately starts out with his posse to effect the outlaw's capture. Shortly after he leaves, another telegram arrives which his daughter Agnes carelessly tucks in her dress unopened. Agnes while at a picnic goes too far into the forest in her search for a hiding place, and gets lost. At last she comes on Jim Dawson camped in an inaccessible portion of the forest. Her desperate plight touches the man and he assures her that she has nothing to fear. In the morning, careless of his own peril, Dawson leads Agnes to the edge of the woods near her home. Here he is pounced upon by the sheriff and his deputy. Agnes' story touches the sheriff but his sense of duty will not allow him to countenance the prisoner's escape. Suddenly Agnes thinks of the telegram. Pulling it from her dress, she hands it to her father. The sheriff opens it, and discovers that the man Dawson shot has recovered and has cleared the prisoner from all blame.

VITAGRAPH.

MRS. UPTON'S DEVICE (Oct. 13).—Mrs. Upton introduces her friend, Molly Meeker, to her husband's young friend, Walter Bliss. She has an idea that they were made for each other. She gives an evening party and the young people are invited to attend. To throw them more closely together, they appoint Walter as Molly's escort to take her home. At home, each, in the quiet of their room, dreams of the other.

Mrs. Upton is relentless to see these two young people married, and again she and Mr. Upton invite them to spend the week-end at their country home. Naturally they are thrown in each other's society playing lawn tennis, in pleasant walks and drives about the villa, which terminate in their engagement. The course of true love never did run smooth, and it is not long before they quarrel and break their engagement.

This is a severe blow to Mrs. Upton, but she does not despair. She tries again by inviting Molly to go to the opera with her. Then, unknown to Molly, she invites Walter. They both accept and are not a little embarrassed to be thrown together again. Gradually the humor of the situation begins to dawn upon them, and it is not long before their differences are repaired and Walter once more places the ring upon Molly's finger.

THE BALLYHOO'S STORY (Oct. 14).—Thoughtlessly picking up a curiously woven basket, a party of sightseers at a pleasure park ask the old Indian curio vender the meaning of its design. He tells the following story:

"Long ago, there lived a beautiful Indian maiden, the daughter of a mighty chieftain. Among her many suitors there was one whom she loved above all others. He was but a common brave. Another had been chosen by her father; a warrior whom she did not love.

"The maiden would have none of him and clandestinely met her lover. One day, however, her father found them together. His wrath knew no bounds and he outlawed the youth from the tribe; and her loved one wandered away.

"Prostrated with grief, the maiden sought out the tribal medicine man and told him her story. Following his advice, she steeped some poisonous weeds and drank the extract, hoping thereby to realize her fondest hopes; fell dead.

"While this occurred, the two rivals met in deadly combat. One of the two, mortally wounded, fell into the rapids, and a water grave. The other, from a knife thrust, reeled fatally wounded to the ground.

"As evening came on the old chieftain, returning to his home, came upon the young brave's

MASTER FIXIT (Oct. 15).—Professor Rugby, in search of rare specimens of entomology, chasing butterflies and various other insects, meets Ruth, a country maiden, with whom he falls in love. He is very much disturbed by the presence of her little brother, Master Fixit, who lets his rare specimens of "bugology" out of his basket, very much interfering with his love-making. Evidently young Fixit takes a pronounced dislike to the professor. It is quite different when Edward Walton, a young city chap, appears upon the scene. His presence is somewhat unexpected. He is fishing in a stream for trout and Master Fixit, seeing his trout fly floating upon the stream, picks it up and fastens it in his sister's dress. Young Walton thinks he has made a catch. So he has, but it is not the kind of a fish he anticipated, but it serves as an introduction to the pretty girl. Immediately a rivalry springs up between Walton and the professor.

Master Fixit enters into an agreement with his friend Walton to get rid of "the buggy gentleman" and fix it so Walton will have the field all to himself. He does this with his slingshot, which he uses upon the most convenient part of the professor's anatomy, also by leading him a chase in the direction of a bear trap, which fastens itself to the studious gentleman and from which he is released by Walton. He soon departs to other realms and Walton has no trouble in telling Ruth of his love and winning hers.

BUDDHIST TEMPLES (Oct. 15).—A comprehensive view of the many phases of the great God of India. Different conceptions of the Buddhist's deity.

THE OUTLAW (Oct. 16).—The citizens of Cherokee County are aroused over the depredations of Jon Wallace, a notorious outlaw and horse thief. Wallace lives with his daughter, Nan. Jim Farrell, a roving young prospector, is caught cheating at cards in the "Red Dog" saloon, and after an exchange of shots with his accuser, he makes his escape into the desert, where, without water and seriously wounded, he wanders aimlessly about all night.

At sunrise Wallace, from his shack, sees the solitary form stagger and fall in the desert. Suspicious of every stranger, Wallace cautiously approaches Farrell, and finding him half dead, takes him back to the shack, where Nan cares for him. She falls in love, but Farrell very lightly regards the devotion of the uncultured mountain girl. Provisions run low. Nan is the only one who can go to town to secure a fresh supply. She accomplishes her errand and Farrell sees in an old newspaper wrapped about her purchases a picture of Wallace, and a notice of the reward offered for information leading to his capture.

One night, while Wallace and Nan are sleeping, Farrell seeks the sheriff, to whom he betrays his benefactor and guides a posse back to the mountain hut, where Wallace and his daughter make a desperate resistance. Wallace is killed and Nan is forced to surrender. The sheriff and his men bury her father's body, after which she returns to the cabin. She sees her father's gun upon the floor and a solitary bullet, which she picks up and places in the rifle. She makes a detour across the hills and catches sight of the departing posse, with Farrell trailing in the rear. She takes aim and, with her last shot, kills the treacherous ingrate.

MATRIMONIAL MANEUVERS (Oct. 17).—Martin Mills is always hard up and he does not like to work. He lives mostly on money supplied by his aunt Julia, a rich widow. His applications become too frequent, but Mrs. Black has a weakness for court news and high society; so she tells her nephew that if he will introduce her to some of the aristocratic friends he is always boasting about, she will give him money, and if she can make a match with one of them, she will give him more; otherwise, her purse is closed.

He goes to an actor, a friend of his, named Hartley, and proposes that he shall pose as Lord Ormonde De Verde. Hartley, who is a decent sort of chap, does not like the job, but he is out of work and in pretty hard straits. At last he consents.

The scheme works well, Julia is infatuated and gives her nephew the advance fee, but it goes farther than was expected, for she actually makes a leap year proposal to Hartley. He writes her that circumstances which he cannot explain have called him from England, perhaps forever. She is terribly upset and gives Martin money and tells him to find her lover and bring him back to her. Hartley in the meantime, on returning home, finds he has secured a London engagement. Things look well for him, but his conscience troubles him. Not satisfied with the way Martin is conducting things, Mrs. Black comes to London herself. Martin tells his servants to get tickets for the theater and Jenkins gets them for the theater at which Hartley is playing. Martin discovers this when too late. Mrs. Black sees Hartley and makes a scene. Then suspecting her nephew she uses stratagem and gets Hartley's address. She goes to him and accuses him and he confesses. She is in a terrible rage and threatens to prosecute him, in spite of his penitence and his wife's prayers. Little Nellie, their daughter, wins her way to Mrs. Black's heart, and for the child's sake she forgives; but she hands her nephew $20 and tells him to get out of England and never come back.

THE PIRATES (Special—2 parts—Oct. 18).—Captain Jim Faulkner receives a letter requesting him to call to attend to a matter of great importance. He reaches the appointed place and there he is confronted by an apparently prosperous and well-to do gentleman, who makes him a proposition to employ his sloop and his crew to board a yacht and to kidnap those on board it. Jim indignantly refuses it and the offer of $10,000. As he turns to leave, he confronts a young woman wearing a mask. She is irresistibly handsome. Impulsively he exclaims: "If you will throw off that mask and go as my captain, I will hold up all the ships on the seven seas!" She consents to do so. Helene boards the sloop as captain and commander. Toward midnight, they sight the yacht which they are to hold up, draw alongside and board it. A terrific struggle follows. Its crew is overcome and their prisoners rushed aboard the "Ella." A revenue cutter gives pursuit. A running fight takes place. Jim orders his men to let out every inch of sail, hoping they may soon escape in an approaching fog.

The chase is exciting, the fog falls and soon they are far beyond the reach of their pursuers. Jim makes way to a wild place on the coast, where he lands his captives and makes provision for their week's stay. Jim is very much surprised at the good-natured way in which they take it. The next morning Helene tells Jim that she will have to go to the city and gives him her promise that she will come back at the end of the week. At the end of seven days Helene returns, loaded down with a collection of newspapers. She holds up one of them and they all read as follows. "Entire Board of Directors of the 'Eat-Um Biscuit Company' captured by Modern Pirates." Helene then introduces Jim to her father, one of the prisoners, and he explains that all his piratical experience means, saying, "The Eat-Um Biscuit Company were on the brink of ruin, our competitors had more money for advertising. We have received a million dollars' worth of free advertising." With a great show, he hands Jim his check for $10,000. The young captain indignantly tears it up and scatters it to the four winds, remarking, "I did not do this for money, I did it for Helene." Her father slaps Jim on the shoulder and places Helene's hand in Jim's, saying: "She could not find me a braver son-in law. She is yours."

KALEM.

THE HERMIT'S RUSE (Oct. 13).—Hayden learns that his wife and Henderson, a gambler, have become friends. He orders this friendship to cease. Mrs. Hayden promises to abide by her husband's request. She breaks her promise, however, when the gambler calls the next day. The two are having tea when Hayden is heard outside. The gambler leaves by the back door. But the miner, who has sized up the situation at a glance, runs to the back door in time to see Henderson disappearing down the street.

Hayden realizes that his wife has merely been foolish and asks the advice of an old friend, Arapahoe, a hermit.

Securing clothes similar to those worn by the gambler, Arapahoe rigs up a dummy and sets it in a field. He then sends an Indian messenger to Mrs. Hayden, telling her to come at once if she desires to prevent her husband from becoming a murderer. At the same time, the hermit goes after the miner and tells him to follow him if he wishes to prevent the gambler from running away with Mrs. Hayden. The miner seizes a rifle and follows.

The hermit brings Hayden to the field where the gambler stands. The miner raises his rifle and fires just as the wife runs up. The gambler is seen to topple over, apparently killed. Mrs. Hayden, realizing her husband's peril, urges him to flee, saying she will go with him. Seeing that the woman now realizes what her friendship for the gambler has brought about, Arapahoe takes Hayden and his wife to the "corpse," and shows them that it is just a tailor's dummy. The ruse has the desired effect.

THE VAMPIRE (Special—3 parts—Oct. 15).—Harold is ensnared by the wiles of Sybil, an adventuress. The boy forgets Helen, his country sweetheart. Sybil's influence over him is so evil that he can no longer apply himself to his work. His employer finally discharges him. When Harold's money is gone, the adventuress throws him over. He becomes a drunkard. Helen, failing to hear from him, comes to the city, where she secures a position. Harold decides to become a hold-up man. To pass away the time before midnight, he goes to a theater where Bert French and Alice Eis are presenting their famous "Vampire Dance."

The characters are an artist and a vampire, in the guise of a wood nymph. Harold sees the artist attracted by the beautiful creature and then his struggles as he realizes what the result of the fascination must inevitably be. The victim beats her in his frenzy of fear, but is irresistibly drawn into the coils by the vampire's fiendish wiles. The vampire fascinates the man by her beauty and lures him toward a forest dell There the horrible creature succeeds in taking his life. Harold feels that a veil has been torn from his eyes. He seems to have reviewed his life with Sybil, and vows to reform. He succeeds in regaining his position and once more takes his place among men. The boy learns of Helen's presence in the city, but can find no trace of her. Sybil, learning of Harold's prosperity, attempts to drag him into her net once more, but the boy, with the memory of "The Vampire Dance" before him, resists her efforts. That night he finds Helen, and to insure his reformation, proposes immediate marriage. His sweetheart consents, and the knot is tied.

THE TROUBLESOME TELEPHONE (Oct. 17).—Mrs. Morris eagerly welcomes the telephone recently installed in the Morris home. She soon falls into the habit of calling up her husband at his office several times an hour.

A patient enters the doctor's office suffering with a toothache. The phone rings. His wife is on the wire. When the conversation ends he finds that the patient has seized the opportunity to escape.

A few moments later, Smith enters the office and begs for relief. At the same moment, Mrs. Morris calls up again. To keep his patient in the chair, the dentist gives him gas. Later two lovers call on Mrs. Morris and she shows them the new phone. She calls her husband up just as he is about to work on Smith. The lovers take advantage of the opportunity to kiss. Morris hears the sound. Believing someone is making love to his wife, he rushes home, leaving Smith in the chair.

When the dentist arrives home he learns of his mistake. About that time his patient awakes from the effect of the gas, and finding his agony unrelieved, smashes the office furniture. When Morris returns he finds his place in a fearful state. In the midst of his survey his wife calls him up to tell him that a mouse is on the piano. Rushing home, the dentist tears the phone from the wall and throws it out of the window.

THE BOSTON FLOATING HOSPITAL (Oct. 17).—To the sick children of Boston's slums this floating hospital is a veritable God-send. The children who cannot be treated at home are taken aboard the vessel with their mothers and given the advantage of the bracing sea air.

The Boston Floating Hospital is completely equipped, and a staff of doctors and nurses watch the condition of their little patients with minute care. The picture shows a day's routine aboard the vessel, and the work that is being done in attending the unfortunates who cannot afford the services of capable doctors.

THE RAILROAD DETECTIVE'S DILEMMA (Oct. 18).—Billy Wayne, railroad detective, is ordered to run down a gang of freight car thieves. In one of the rifled cars he finds a piece of paper on which several Italian words are written. He is led to suspect a gang of section hands working in the vicinity and fixes upon an Italian called Nick as their leader.

Billy saves the life of Tony, a laborer. Nick, who loves Rosa, Tony's daughter, resents the friendship and quarrels with Tony. That evening the latter receives a threatening missive and in alarm sends Rosa for Billy. The detective finds that the writing in the letter is identical with that on the paper in his possession.

The following day Billy accidentally loses a pair of handcuffs, which are found by Nick. The detective is waylaid that evening and is placed in a sack. Noticing a mail pouch hanging from a crane, and waiting to be picked up by the fast mail, Nick removes the pouch, replacing it with the sack containing Billy.

The gang then proceeds to Tony's house. They attack him, after informing the man of the fate in store for his friend. Rosa dashes out of the house to save Billy, but the whistle of the fast mail tells her she cannot reach the crane in time. In desperation she snatches a stilletto from her bosom and hurls it into the mail car as it dashes by. The knife strikes the clerk, who is holding the mail catcher, in the arm. He releases his hold just in time to miss the sack containing Billy. The train is stopped and Billy liberated. The passengers, headed by Billy, rush to the house in time to save Tony. The desperadoes are soon in custody, and as Nick is taken away, Billy asks Rosa to be his wife.

ESSANAY.

THREE SCRAPS OF PAPER (Oct. 14).—Ruth is kidnapped by an unsuccessful and jealous suitor. She is taken to an old tumble-down house in an out-of-the-way section of the city. She writes a message, calling for help, on three scraps of paper and throws them out of the window. In a very remarkable manner the three pieces of paper find their way to her fiancé, who rescues her just in time to prevent her from being forcibly married to her kidnapper.

THEIR WATERLOO (Oct. 15).—Susan has three ardent admirers, and she, loving admiration more than she loves any particular man, is sweet to all, and encourages each of them in their attentions. Father and brother object to all three of the young men and never allow any of them to call on her. One day when all the family but Susan are away, the three boys come to pay their respects, but the unexpected return of the family sends Susan scurrying to hide her three friends. The situations that develop with the three in hiding are screamingly funny.

A BORROWED IDENTITY (Oct. 13).—Harry West, on the way to visit the ranch of his father's friend, meets and changes clothes with a cowboy, in order to play a joke on his prospective host. The real cowboy is mistaken by the family for their guest from the East, and "fussed" over considerably by everyone but Evelyn, who has heart and eyes for no one but the make-believe cowboy. Harry is arrested on a charge of horse-stealing, in spite of his protestations and denial of guilt. Through Evelyn he sends a telegram to his father. Mr. West arrives and Harry is released on his recognition, and joyfully received by the ranch-owner and his family. It is his acquaintance of the road who is the guilty one. Harry introduces Evelyn to his father as his fiancee

BRONCHO BILLY GETS SQUARE (2 parts—Oct. 17).—A reward is offered for the capture of Broncho Billy and David Kirkland and freedom is promised to either one who will turn state's evidence. Broncho and Dave are pals, but they fall out over a pretty Indian girl and Dave, who is jealous of Broncho Billy's success in winning the favor of the girl, tells the sheriff where to find Billy, and the latter is captured. Dave then writes a letter to the Indian girl under Billy's name and tells her that he is going away and cannot marry her. Fifteen years later Billy is released from prison and finds White Feather, the once pretty Indian girl, a gray-haired, worn-out squaw. She tells him that she became the wife of Dave and that he had deserted her. Billy sets out to get Dave, who has become a roving gambler. In the little town of Sennet, Dave has succeeded in getting the postmaster and storekeeper in his power and won his consent to let Dave marry his daughter Grace. The girl is engaged to a young ranchman, but agrees to marry Dave to save her father from disgrace. Just as the wedding is about to be performed, Billy comes on the scene with White Feather and several Indians of her tribe. Kirkland is exposed and is taken away by the Indians. Ned is sent for and marries Grace and Broncho Billy is happy.

Sargent's Photoplay Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

BIOGRAPH.

McGANN AND HIS OCTETTE (Oct. 13).—Dan McGann is served with a warrant by Ikey Goldstein for non-payment of rent and is borne off to the police station. Ikey reckons without Judge O'Reilly, a friend of Mrs. McGann. The judge decrees that Goldstein should support the family during McGann's sojourn in jail. Did Ikey stand for that?

AUNTS, TOO MANY (Oct. 13).—Krazy-Nutt, tired of the confinement of four stone walls, left quite unexpectedly. Krazy-Nutt's passion was athletics. Mr. Newlywed thought Krazy-Nutt his aunt and sought to gratify the passion when Krazy-Nutt cried for a horse to go horseback. The Dilly boys of the local theater supplied the need as the fore and aft of a much desired steed. They started something and kept it up—and Krazy-Nutt had a ride all right, all right.

RED AND PETE, PARTNERS (Oct. 16).—Mrs. Van Thorn stepped from her automobile to interview the officer of the Traffic Squad. She dropped the necklace her husband had given her that day. It was found by little May, who took it home to her sick grandfather. Red and Pete followed. After the affair in the house, Red pretended he did not find the necklace. Pete learned of his trickery. Each accused the other before the officers, who took matters into their own hands.

THE GIRL ACROSS THE WAY (Oct. 18).—It was a lonesome old burg the boy found, back for his vacation. Interesting possibilities appeared in the girl across the street. He started in to show her life. It lifted the veil of his intention. Then came his repentance. She forgave as the "Book of books" directed. The mother of ambition and wealth stepped in, but the boy took off his coat and got to work. As for the rest, a mother's a mother.

NESTOR

ROGER, THE PRIDE OF THE RANCH (Oct. 13).—John Allen has two daughters, Betty, a quiet, demure girl, her mother's right hand "man," and Allie, a pretty, vivacious young lady, who has just spent a year in the East. To celebrate Allie's home-coming, the father gives her a beautiful white horse, named Roger, which the boys call "The Pride of the Ranch." Betty is pleased to have her sister home and to have her receive Roger, but not to have Ned Roberts spend so much of his time with her. She is unaware that Ned and Allie are only planning an engagement ring for her. Bert Andrews is also displeased with Ned, for he wants Allie to himself. Allie, however, takes a dislike to him and is delighted when Ned declares that Roger can easily beat Bert's famous horse, "Beauty." The men bet heavily, and Bert bribes Bill, one of the Allen cowboys, to note Roger's speed, and notify him at once. Bill obeys, and as a result, Bert pays him to secret Roger until after the race is over. To do this, Bill is obliged to chloroform Joe, the trainer. He then takes Roger to a hiding place. The cowboys all turn out, however, and soon trace "The Pride of the Ranch" and bring him safely home in time to start for the track. Ned, Allie and her father start for the race. Joe, upon attempting to mount the horse, finds he is too weak to ride. Not daring to trust one of the boys to ride Roger, Betty dresses in Joe's clothes, enters the track as the trainer and wins the race before anyone recognizes her.

Allie is delighted with her quiet little sister and sends Ned hurrying after her with the delayed engagement ring, while she walks proudly off past Bert with "The Pride of the Ranch."

PATSY'S LUCK (Oct. 15).—Patsy's wife, Tilda, rules him with an iron rod. One day she sends him to town to match some dress goods for her, but he returns late with the wrong goods. Patsy is at a loss to know what to do, when his friends surround him and literally pull him in to have a little drink "to bolster up his courage." The "just one" ends in several, so that when Patsy arrives near home and finds he has picked up a bottle of whiskey from the bar instead of the dress goods; he longs to become an outlaw.

Turning his horse around, Patsy soon comes upon a band of real outlaws in the woods. When the outlaws demand an explanation, he hilariously insists that he is the outlaw for whom a reward has just been offered. The captain and his men, pleased to meet so great a personage, at once become friendly and later tells him of a plan to rob the town bank that night.

Waiting until all are asleep, Patsy creeps out, mounts his horse and slips away into the night to notify the sheriff; then hurries back and has just laid down under his blanket when the captain and his men awaken to start upon their night's work. Soon, with Patsy to guide them, they are on their way and arrive at the bank, to be surrounded by the sheriff and his posse. Then Patsy remembers Tilda. The sheriff, however, reassures him with a letter, which offers a big reward for these outlaws, so that he is not only received with open arms, but is treated with due respect.

THEIR TWO KIDS (Oct. 17).—John McDonald is madly in love with Ramona, the pretty daughter of a crusty old millionaire named Fording, who refuses to let John marry Ramona until his fortune equals hers.

John writes to his father for the wherewithal, but his father writes to the effect that when John had settled down and had two kids of his own, the money would be forthcoming. Les Morane, a club friend, calls on John, and finding him in the deep blues, inquires the cause. Shown the letter, his eye catches the phrase "2 kids," and turning to Paton, another friend, he whispers a word, and leaving the mystified John, they hurry away. Later that night the apartment house is disturbed by the return of the boys, accompanied by a small kid—goat. John, after his surprise is over, realizes the joke to be played on father, and hastily wires him to the effect that he has one kid and expects another at any moment. The latter part of this is true, as the boys have gone in search of another.

Arriving at John's apartment they display their trophy and a second wire reaches dad to the effect that the second kid arrived and to send along the money. The fact of the kids eating John's shirt inspires a postscript, "Appetite immense—eating everything in sight." Dad received this wire and sends the check immediately, but he also determines to visit the happy family. After a shower of kisses dad unpacks the toys and demands to see the "kids." Ramona tries to explain the recent wedding, but dad produces the incriminating telegram about the second kid and Ramona bursts into tears, thinking John has been married before. She immediately decides to go home to mother and dad agrees to accompany her. Ramona pens a hurried note to John, telling him she knows all and has returned to mother. John received the note at the club and his two friends decide to help him out. The 2 kids, kept at the club, as mascots, are seized, and John hurries to Ramona's home. Here he is greeted by a storm from the two fathers, Ramona and her mother. Motioning his friends on he shows all of them his two "kids" and Ramona rushes to his arms as the fathers both bless and forgive him.

FRONTIER.

CURING THE DOCTOR (Oct. 16).—When a girl decides she should flirt, she usually succeeds, much to the discomfiture of the young man. Dorothy Vernon was no exception to the rule. Her decision to flirt brings her many admirers, among them Harry Willets and Dr. John Roth. At her home she finds Count Von Gasbag, a German nobleman, being entertained by mamma, who has had dreams of a title for her daughter. Dotty takes the cue from mamma, starts immediately to captivate the count, much to the disgust of Willets. He leaves in high dungeon, hikes to his home and spends the night on the veranda much against the wishes of his mother. He catches a very severe cold, and in the morning a hurry call is sent for Dr. Roth. The doctor comes and seeing his opportunity to dispose of his hated rival, he tells the mother that she must take her son out West, where he can get more sunshine, and live a strenuous life, that he has serious lung trouble.

Dotty and the count call and offer their sympathies. Willets asks Dotty to marry him, but she could not think of marrying a dying man. She leaves him to his fate. Later health comes to young Willets. He marries Juanita, the beautiful daughter of the Spanish inn keeper. He then sends a message to Dr. Roth to come at once. Dotty has married the count and they are off on their wedding tour. Dr. Roth boards the same train on his way west to see Willets, who is dying, and his sympathy is aroused. The doctor induces Dotty and the count to get off at Santa Paula to visit the supposedly dying man.

Juanita's father meets the doctor and party at the train, and shows them to the hotel. The doctor and Dotty get the surprise of their lives when they see young Willets so strong. The doctor is very much disturbed, for he feels that he is the victim of the joke. He introduced Dotty's husband, feeling that it will shock young Willets. Willets says, "You have none the best of me, allow me to introduce my wife."

Young Willets then tells the doctor he thinks he has something coming to him and that he is going to give it to him. He immediately starts to clean up the street with the doctor, which he does in a most artistic manner.

THE BRUTE (Oct. 18).—It is often said that the brute nature in the make-up of a man may be subdued by the constant love of a good woman. Such is the case with one Jim Burt, a mining prospector. Burt had been in the habit of ill treating his wife. One morning he and his wife's attention are attracted by a lynching bee. It seems that Pedro Mendoza a young Mexican boy, is a little inclined at times to cheat at cards. He is caught in the act and the wrath of the cowboys with whom he is playing is aroused, and they form themselves into a vigilant committee to rid themselves of the cheat. Mary begs her husband to interfere, but he will have nothing to do with the matter. Seeing this Mary decides to interfere herself. The rough and uncouth men are touched by her pleadings and release Pedro.

Jim starts out on a prospecting tour, and stops at the shack of old Gonzales, a reprobate Mexican, to inquire the road. It so happens that Gonzales is the father of Anita, Pedro Mendoza's sweetheart, and when Jim sees her he craves to possess her. He takes advantage of Gonzales' drunkenness and makes a deal with him to take the girl with him as his cook. Shortly afterward Pedro calls on his sweetheart and her father tells him of the deal he had made with the prospector. Pedro becomes enraged at this and decides to track Jim and the girl.

In the meantime Mary decides to follow her husband. Pedro later discovers Jim's camp and decides to rescue Anita from him. He takes advantage of Jim's back being turned from him and grabs him by the throat. The men struggle and Pedro is about to finish Jim with a blow from the butt of his gun when Mary, who has discovered them, pleads for her husband's life in return for the life she gave Pedro earlier in the day. Pedro grants this and takes Anita and they start for home. Jim, who is very much ashamed of himself, for the first time in many years takes his wife to his arms in a loving embrace.

FROM THE BEYOND (Three parts—Oct. 15).—William Lodge, a professor of psychology, his assistant, Otto Myers, and his daughter, Nora, spend all their time conducting seances in the professor's private laboratory. Nora is a psychic, a medium through whom her father has succeeded in getting members of the spirit world to appear and with specially constructed apparatus has photographed them. Dr. Fred Nevins, head of the institute, who scoffs at spiritualism, and Jack Pearst, a newspaper man, visit Professor Lodge at his laboratory. Nevins manages to steal one of the photographs showing Nora and the shade. Later, he has a clever photographer make two separate photographs. These he offers for examination at the next meeting of the institute, where Lodge is lecturing, to disprove his achievement. In this way the professor becomes dishonored in the eyes of his colleagues and the public. To right himself and show Nevins up, Lodge proposes to prove his discovery of the Hindoo secret of suspended life by being shut up in a sarcophagus for the period of one month. To protect himself in case of failure in the experiment, Lodge sends Myers, his assistant, to Canada, where he must send word back that Lodge is with him. Even Nora and his mother are left in ignorance of the professor's real whereabouts. When the Canadian Imperial Hotel is burned to the ground, Lodge is reported among those dead, and Myers, bound to silence, cannot contradict the report. Nevins, now being haunted by the astral body of Lodge, has Myers imprisoned on a charge that he murdered Lodge. In this position he is unable to free Lodge on the appointed day. Nora, grief stricken at these developments, causes her father's shade to materialize, and is directed to the dictaphone in his library. From this she gets the message, "I am not dead. I am in the sarcophagus," left by Lodge previously. Lodge is freed and appears at the court as sentence was about to be passed. After explanations, Professor Lodge is made an honored member of the Psychological Institute, taking Dr. Nevin's place. Myers and Nora, drawn together by their suffering, gain consent to their marriage.

BISON.

IN THE WILDS OF AFRICA (2 parts—Oct. 14).—Dr. Clifford, a missionary in the heart of Africa, finds his task no easy one. The Sheik Ali Ben Abdul's child falls sick, and he is advised to send for the "doctor missionary." Clifford treats the child, leaving it much better. Meanwhile, a native is mauled by a lion, and again Clifford is sent for. It so happens that Paul, a brother missionary, is calling upon Clifford's sister, Alice. Clifford being absent, Paul consents to go with Alice and see the injured native and finds on his arrival that he can do no good.

Clifford's baby has attempted to follow her aunt, and is followed by a chimpanzee, and Clifford's wife not seeing the child, follows, armed with a rifle. Mrs. Clifford is pursued by a lion and climbs into a tree until it passes, when she renews her search. Paul and Alice return and cannot find Mrs. Clifford and the baby, and go to find them. They are, in turn, attacked by a lion, and Paul wounds the brute. The chimpanzee leads baby Alice into a hollow tree as it sees the lion coming, and the distracted mother passes close by. The witch doctor of the natives persuades the chief that Paul killed the man, and the natives burn Clifford's house. Clifford finds his house in ruins, and starts out to hunt his beloved ones. He goes for the mounted police, but his horse shies at the chimpanzee, which has left the baby, and he rises with a hurt leg. Paul and Alice find the child, and the exhausted mother is discovered by her pet elephant, who lifts her to his back. Clifford staggers to a stream, and being faced by a lion, shoots it, and is helped from the water by an Arab, who has been sent to seek him to again attend the Sheik's sick child. He is helped to a horse, and on the way they fall in with Paul and Alice and the child. The elephant arrives with Mrs. Clifford.

THROUGH BARRIERS OF FIRE (Two-part—Oct. 18).—Chance Ward, a Northern sympathizer, leaves his Southern home and enlists in the Northern army at the outbreak of the Civil War. Later, in 1864, Edwin August, a young Southerner, joins the Confederate forces. Edwin leaves behind his mother, his sweetheart and his brother Frank. During an engagement, the Confederates run short of ammunition. Edwin reports this condition to the Confederate commander, who sends an orderly with Edwin to deliver dispatches to outlying posts asking for more ammunition. The orderly falls into the hands of the Yankees and is taken to the Union headquarters, while Edwin succeeds in getting through the lines. The Union commander reads the dispatch requesting help, found on the captured orderly. He sends a detachment to light fires around the Confederates and burn down the bridge, their supply route. In the Confederate outposts these fires are seen as the ammunition is about to be dispatched. The regular gun carriage driver refuses to run the risk of driving powder through the flames. Edwin volunteers to undertake the perilous feat. He mounts the carriage and makes a dash for the bridge, succeeding in crossing just before it falls. Later, he and a troop of Confederates are returning to camp when they come upon a Union foraging party. The Confederates surprise the Yankees; and in the skirmish, Ward, the Union soldier, and Edwin, the Confederate, become separated from their respective commands. As the Yankees escape in the woods, the two meet and in a hand-to-hand fight Ward is killed, Edwin escaping just as he is discovered by the retreating Yankees. Edwin flees into the nearest house and asks the woman

As they leave, they tell her the man they were looking for was the man who killed her husband. Edwin comes out and learns that it was the husband of his savior whom he killed. The wife blames him, but he tells her the situation and she understands. Edwin leaves her with the body and returns to his command. The war has ended and Edwin goes back to his home, where a joyful re-union takes place, while Ward's wife and child sorrow for the husband who gave up his life for the cause of his country.

REX.

MEMORIES (Rex), Oct. 16.—An old lady in a picture gallery sits before a picture entitled "Youth in the Garden of Innocence." The picture springs to life and she sees an allegory which largely represents the life of many women, her own included. A girl blossoming into womanhood and full of the joy of life tires of the narrow confines of her garden and going to the garden gate, she pleads with the woman, Experience, to let her through. Experience tries to dissuade her, but the girl insists and enters. In another garden beset with stones and many weeds, she encounters Love, who leads her hand in hand to some pretty spots. She sees Life coming along with a woman, beautifully garbed, and with many jewels, and becomes conscious of her own lack of jewels and pretty clothes. Life sees and covets the girl, and she is flattered when he gives her a jewel, which he takes from the woman with him. Love offers her a flower instead, but she puts it aside for the jewel, and as she goes with Life and his Mistress, Love goes sorrowfully away. Youth is shown in Life's beautiful home, and she is given gowns. She meets Life and his Mistress, and while Experience looks sorrowfully on, she drains the goblet of Life and sees Life changed into Mephistopheles. The scales fall from her eyes and she seeks Love. She finds him dead, and implores Experience to take her back to the garden of youth, but it cannoat be done. She weepingly leans on Experience and goes forth into the world. The picture again becomes inanimate and the old lady is told the gallery is closing. The attendant draws a curtain over the picture.

CRIMINALS (Two parts—Oct. 19).—Richard Wainwright is living a double existence; a well-to-do man by day, and a cunning burglar at night. He worships his daughter, Pauline, who for charity performs many kindly acts. One James Stevens, a man old in crime, is a maker of criminals. Wainwright has done his full share of wrong, for besides being an expert cracksman, he has led others astray, including the two Rosson boys, who live with their young sister. She knows what they are doing and vainly endeavors to reform them. She, too, does many little acts of kindness, and one day while she is visiting a poor widow, she meets Pauline, who learns that her heart is breaking because she cannot reclaim her dear brothers. Pauline promises to help her and she appeals to the brothers but they tell her that they cannot live on the scanty wages they can—earn. They tell her that if she lands Jim Stevens in prison, she will do more good than by trying to reform them. She determines to do this. When the brothers have gone, the sister tells Pauline that "John Dick" (Wainwright) makes the boys steal. Pauline also resolves to see him and appeal to him. She discovers their haunts and tries to get an interview with "John Dick." Failing in this she goes to Jim Stevens, and gaining admittance she begs him to give up his calling. He has her turned out. That night she goes to Stevens' office and opens the door with a hairpin—a trick shown her by her father. She gets in and hunts for evidence and is interrupted by the entrance of someone else. She comes face to face with the intruder and learns for the first time that her father is the noted cracksman. While she is in a faint, the father gets the papers she wants and places them near her. On coming to she finds them and takes them to the editor of the daily paper. Wainwright persuades the "boys" to quit the crooked game and goes away. Pauline hears that Stevens has been arrested, and has shot himself. She finds a note from her father, telling her that by the time he returns, the law will have been satisfied and that he loves her better than life. She has done her duty and will await his return.

THE GIRL O' THE WOODS (Two parts—Oct. 17).—Bruce Cameron receives a letter from a prospective purchaser of a wild tract of land in Tennessee that he has learned that squatters have settled upon it. Cameron sends his son, Hal, to look up the matter and eject the squatters. These squatters prove to be Dan and Jake Hawkins, young hunters, and their sister Mab. Hal secures an order of eviction from the court and proceeds to the township to give the warrant to the constable. The constable, in sympathy with the squatters, warns Hal that he will be shot if he attempts to carry out his purpose. The constable then proceeds to the squatters place and assures the two boys that if they kill Hal they will not be prosecuted. Previous to this, Jake and Dan have decreed that Mab shall marry Nat Craig, a dissolute young hunter. Well armed, the two boys and the girl scatter in the woods to await the coming of Hal. While Hal is resting on a rock reading, Mab comes upon him. He is the first man of the outer world to enter her life. She instinctively admires him and is convinced that he is not the hated owner of the land. Yet she decides to shoot him and is only prevented by the picture book Hal holds in his hands. She can draw and she loves pictures. Laying down her gun, she approaches. Hal is impressed with her round, healthy body and smiling face. They become better acquainted and he gives her his card. When she is gone, he decides it is too late to visit the squatters, unaware that she is one of them. On the following day they meet again and the attraction deepens. Mab takes the card to the sheriff to learn the name upon it—she can neither read nor write. She learns that the man she loves is the man her brothers are after—the man whom she should hate. Her brothers go gunning for Hal that day and Mab is resigned to not interfere. But her love triumphs and she sketches a warning on paper and fastens it to a tree at the trysting place. He sees it and decides to go away. She manages to meet him and denounces him as her enemy and the enemy of her brothers. He declares his love and urges her to marry him. She refuses and when he is gone the full realization of her hopeless plight comes upon her. Returning home, Hal persuades his father to send the Hawkins a deed to the land. Later, he receives a queer letter—on an envelope is pinned to the visiting card he gave Mab and on the paper is a drawing showing the girl holding out her arms to him. In the woods he finds her full of life and ambition to reach a higher plane of living.

ing that he might threaten their safety, determine to get rid of him. The smuggler goes to a sea captain and offers to get him another sailor, to which proposal the captain cheerfully assents and the smugglers seize the unsuspecting artist. The artist on the anchored ship secures a knife and cutting his bonds, jumps overboard after a fight with the mate, who follows him, and after a terrific struggle in the water, the mate is killed, and the artist reaches the shore in an exhausted condition. He is filled with the desire for revenge, and looks for the smuggler and sees him sitting on the dock. But his child has wandered from its mother and falls from the dock into the water. The smuggler jumps in and saves her. The desire for revenge melts into gratitude as the artist grasps the hand of the smuggler, who begs for a lock of the child's hair as his reward.

HIS PAL'S BEQUEST (Oct. 17).—John Randall, a confirmed bachelor, received a dying message from an old pal to be guardian and friend to his daughter, Marcia. He is horribly frightened at the idea, but does not feel he can evade the responsibility. Marcia arrives—a delightful bit of femininity. She starts to make John's house look neat and clean and bosses the willing serving man.

Harold Runyon, John's good-looking nephew, is in the clutches of an adventuress, "The Wasp," who, at the instigation of her companion, D'Armand, manages to bleed him of considerable sums of money. Harold gets very hard up and decides to try and get a loan from John. He calls and sees Marcia and is soon in love with her.

While John and Marcia are absent, Harold is tempted to forge a check on John, but the latter finds him writing and prevents the crime. John sees a picture of the Wasp and urges Harold to give her up, and Harold leaves after some high words.

John, believing that Marcia loves Harold, goes to the Wasp and writes her a check to leave Harold alone. The latter comes and sees them together and puts a wrong construction on their meeting. He denounces them both.

Six months pass and Marcia cannot understand John's attitude toward her. He loves her, but believes she favors Harold. The latter calls and proposes to her and learns that she loves John and not him. He leads her to John, and leaves them together and John learns that he is the chosen one.

THE SURF MAIDENS (Oct. 13).—A bevy of chorus girls, at the close of a successful season, decide to go on a spree, to a quiet beach resort. They plan beautiful designs in bathing suits. The country rubes go crazy over them, but the local Spinsters' Club is aroused and the girls are all arrested in their bathing suits. The judge fines them each five dollars. There is no money in their bathing suits! The judge pays their fines himself and, later goes to collect the money. The girls give him the time of his life. From being a "Rube Town" the conditions become altered, but the Spinsters' Club gets busy and the girls aid them; eventually a good moral lesson is given to the community.

HIDDEN FIRES (Oct. 13).—Whimsical Jane Gail has just finished a successful starring season with "The Merry Bachelors" and decides to go for her vacation to a remote fishing village to get the right atmosphere for her new part in the next production. She leaves her husband, Charles Craig, and her child Mimi, both of whom she loves devotedly, and sets out on her journey. She arrives at the village and secures rooms at the house of a widow, Mrs. Moore, whose son Matthew (a fisherman) is her sole support. Jane conceals the fact that she is married and an actress and soon the impressionable young fisherman is over head and ears in love with her. Jane is delighted with this—as it is in accord with her new part—so she leads him on, until he worships the very ground she walks on. The golden days go on without a shadow to disturb the young fisherman's happiness, until like a bolt from the blue sky, Jane sends for husband and child, and on their arrival the fisherman finds out how he has been fooled. The shock leaves him dazed with grief, and the sight of the other man kissing Jane makes him yearn for vengeance. He decoys the husband to his boat, knocks him senseless and takes him to the treacherous manacles rocks, which the seas sweep over at high tide. Jane, frightened at her husband's absence asks the fisherman where he is. He with fiendish glee, hands her his telescope and points him out to her on the rocks, with the waves dashing over him. She begs with him to save her husband, but he pushes her roughly away and tells her that she has to pay for her sport. Realizing that he is in earnest, she holds up her child Mimi, who pleads for her father's life. The fisherman, touched by the child's pleading, grimly sets out in his boat, only just in time to save the husband, whom he delivers back to the wife and child and then sternly bids him "keep your woman away from men, because sometimes they are apt to make mistakes."

THE DARE-DEVIL MOUNTAINEERS (2 parts—Oct. 16).—She is a wild young thing, the heroine of this drama, living along with her widowed mother high in the hills. She loves, and is loved by, a young man of her own tribe, a dare-devil of the worst kind. The widow, however, has seen enough of the world to encourage social ambitions and she takes her daughter and moves to a distant city.

Without the girl the young mountaineer is unable to console himself. In the city the mother is seeking to force her daughter into an alliance with a fortune hunting Count. Hearing of this, the mountaineer seeks the city and the girl. Locating her home on the eve of the wedding, he climbs the rainpipe to her room. Willingly she joins in an effort to escape.

They are hotly pursued. Though ignorant of its workings the boy purloins a motorcycle and with the girl back of him they make a wild dash, with the Count in an auto and several motorcycle policemen following close behind. When the couple come to an open drawbridge they rush onto it without a moment's hesitation and plunge, motor and all, into the water some forty feet below. Out of the city and across the state line they fly. In the mountains they live their own life as they see it, happy in each other's love.

GETTING THE GRIP (Oct. 14).—Harold calls on Nell. He suggests taking her out on the river for a row. Nell's mother insists on accompanying them. Harold hires a boat and they go out. After a while, mother persists in trying her hand at rowing and while changing places with Harold in the boat she upsets it and all three are precipitated into the water. They swim to shore, wet, frozen, and much the worse for, when Harold offers to get them some clothes that are dry. By chance he sees an auto passing, from which drops a grip. He gets it and upon opening it finds that it contains some man's wearing apparel. He gives some to the girl and her mother and dons some himself. They again start on their way home. Meanwhile the occupant of the automobile discovers the loss of the grip and looks for same. He sees the three with the grip and his clothes on and gives chase. They pelt him with stones and finally elude him, going home. They are no sooner home and still in their strange raiment when the door-bell rings and once again they are confronted by the man who has chased them and whose grip they stole. They order him out of the house, but he shows mother a letter of introduction to PEARL'S MISTAKE (Oct. 14).—Pearl and Chester are sweethearts. Pearl's maid Nora is in love with John Billings, a plain gentleman. Pearl enters the kitchen while Nora is entertaining John, who is not making much headway in his attempts at winning Nora. Nora introduces John to Pearl and she treats him well. He admires her openly, making Nora jealous. He leaves. The next day he writes Pearl a letter, telling her he loves her maid and asking her advice on how to win her. Pearl writes a letter telling him that the way to win a girl is to take her in your arms and kiss her. She also writes a letter to Chester, asking him to call that evening. Nora sees the letter, asking Chester to call that evening, and seeing the envelope addressed to John, thinks it is meant for him. By mistake Pearl mixes up the letters and John gets the one, asking him to call that evening, while Chester gets the one, telling him to take a girl in his arms and kiss her. John calls first and proceeds to make love to Pearl. Nora enters with a carving knife. Pearl promptly faints. John runs out the window, with Nora after him. He finally eludes her. Chester calls as Pearl recovers from her faint and following her advice takes her in his arms and kisses her. She does not resent his actions and when he sees no opposition claims her as his own.

MAKING PIG IRON (Oct. 13).—The first scene shows the loading of scrap for remelting by means of a powerful electro-magnet. There is shown a series of pictures at a blast furnace having a daily capacity of five hundred tons, with the large volume of molten metal pouring from the orifice; the tremendous ladles carrying the metal to the pig machine, the hot pigs on the conveyer and the discharging and cooling of pigs at the yards for shipment, form an interesting part of this subject.

COURAGE OF SORTS (Oct. 13).—Silas Bragg, owner of a big ranch, laid down the law that no man should marry his daughter until he had first proven his heroism. Hence when young Dr. Winton paid court to his daughter, Silas decided some test of courage was necessary. It was decided that on the following night he, Silas, would go to the haunted house on the hill to see if the doctor had spent the night there alone. It was agreed and arranged.

Silas, the next day, looked up some ancient white coverings, closely resembling a woman's nightgown, and was observed in his movements by the astute daughter, who put her sweetheart "wise." Late that day, attired in a long nightgown, Silas sallied forth. Arriving at the haunted house, Silas saw a gate open by invisible hands. He trembled. Suddenly to his horrified gaze a skeleton lowered itself from the tree in front of him—then the door of the house swung wide of its own accord. When Silas Bragg reached the farmhouse, the ghost in pursuit found no difficulty in claiming the hand of pretty Mabel Bragg.

THE END OF BLACK BART (Oct. 16).—The mountains of southern California had become unsafe for regular travel because of the daring of a lone bandit known as Black Bart. When excitement ran at its height in the town of Hurtsville, the International Stock Company made its appearance for an engagement at the Opera House. For an hour before the scheduled performance the entire company had given an open air concert and the leading man had been racing up and down with hand bills. It was almost time for the curtain to rise, but the expected audience proved a sore disappointment. The house manager insisted upon giving the performance according to contract, but the leading lady balked. The fifty per cent. of receipts would not pay the hotel expense of a single member of the company, so their baggage was held by the hotel proprietor to satisfy his claim for a day's board.

Some were given odd jobs about the hotel to work off their bill, but the leading man and lady were told to secure work on a ranch. In desperation they attempted even this, but their efforts proved in vain. Accidentally they came upon the dug-out of Black Bart, and, in the absence of the occupant, they feasted on the food they found stored away.

After their meal they realized the nature of the place they found and taking a formidable-looking pistol they wandered on only to run into the bandit. Having no valuables about them, he requires a demonstration to prove their claim of being stranded actors. This folly proved his undoing, because it gave them chance to disarm him, but by a ruse he regained his pistol, but a running fight resulted in the bandit's death.

Fear-stricken, they fled from the scene of what they presumed to be their crime. The sheriff had been warned by two men, who by chance came upon the drama that was being enacted in the woods, and with a posse he went to their relief. When the body of the bandit was found, they made diligent search for the two actors and upon finding them brought them in under arrest, only to give them the reward of $500 that had been offered for the arrest of the bandit. Joy in the company ranks knew no bounds when this rare good fortune enabled them to liquidate and regain their effects.

THE MAKING OF A WOMAN (Oct. 18).—To the whole-hearted Jim Blake, all women were angels. Consequently within a month after his marriage to Gladys, he begins to realize in a dumb sort of way that a butterfly is a butterfly and will not, without a miracle, become a creature of more substantial worth.

But the gods are kind to Jim and send to his aid an angel in the person of Red Dolan, the outlaw. Now Dolan loved only one being in the world and this was his son, Billy. The crime of murder made it desirable for Dolan to occupy an inaccessible place in the hills. Fate guides the wife of Jim Blake to the vicinity of Red Dolan's shack in her anxiety to get back home after a quarrel with Jim. She is lost in the woods and becomes terror-stricken. Her cries for help bring out Red Dolan, who forces her to accompany him to help his boy. She refuses the aid asked, even the offer of the reward for Dolan's capture will not induce her. She hears the voice of the child in delirium cry out "mother." She no longer can resist and by morning her efforts have caused the fever to leave the boy.

When later the smoke from the shack guides the frantic Jim Blake to the place, he is overjoyed to find his wife. The experience has worked a miracle with Gladys. The better nature of the woman has been aroused. There is a mutual obligation between the men. Jim has recovered his wife, awakened to the responsibilities resting upon her, and Red Dolan has the companionship of his boy. For this he was willing to surrender himself so that Jim's wife could receive the reward, and upon Jim's request he promises to leave the country and lead a better life.

RELIANCE.

THE BUFFER (Oct. 6).—Dick and Daisy have their honeymoon interrupted by Dick's cousin Howard. Daisy resents this intrusion, but Dick is rather pleased at having another man in the house to play golf and billiards with. Finding herself left very much alone she writes to her brother telling him of the situation. He answers her letter advising her to pretend to Howard that she has fallen in love with him, thus frightening him away. She tries this very successfully. Poor Howard is so overcome that he decides to leave the house at once. But he finds the letter from Daisy's brother and understands her little plan. Then he makes up his mind to turn the tables and give Daisy a bad half hour. He pretends to her that her affection is all returned and commences making wild love. She, frightened, tries to get out of his arms. It is thus that her husband finds them. He asks for an explanation. Howard with serious face tells him that he and Daisy love one another and are going away. Daisy tries to protest that this is false. Her husband pushes her one side. He demands that Howard fight a duel with him. Howard solemnly agrees. But as all preparations are made, he tells his cousin that the joke has gone far enough and explains it all. Despite Dick's request that he stay he says No. Taking his traps he leaves the house to the honeymooners, much to Dick's regret—but to Daisy's joy.

ONCE UPON A TIME (Oct. 8).—Once upon a time in a fairy kingdom there lived a beautiful little princess who was called Rosebud. Tired of the court she wanders away and in the woods meets a witch's daughter. They become great friends. Rosebud is betrothed to Prince Charming and the betrothal feast takes place amid much gayety. The Prince—lost in the woods—comes across the witch's daughter and she not knowing who he is casts a spell over him. The King learns of this through his court jester and has the witch's daughter flung into a dungeon. She is rescued by Rosebud. Then for the first time the poor girl learns whose lover the Prince Charming is and she straightway breaks the spell. And so the Prince returns to his Princess and all is happiness for ever after.

THE REBELLIOUS PUPIL (Oct. 11).—Young John Marsden goes to a little town to take charge of his first school. In this town lives a family named Barton—a wild untamed bunch—the worst of whom is a sixteen year old daughter, Peggy, a wild imp. She goes to school only to make teacher's life miserable. Marsden tries to be nice to the girl but to no avail. Seeing her on Sunday, ashamed of her torn bonnet, he offers to buy her the prettiest bonnet in town if she will be good for a week. Half-heartedly she consents. She is also growing fonder of the teacher—but her fondness is the real thing. She begins to try hard. Then a young lady comes from the city and Marsden is seen with her a great deal. Peggy is aroused to jealousy and hatred. She is again the sulky, bad girl and makes poor Marsden's life miserable. Peggy strikes a boy with a wad of paper. For discipline's sake he is forced to punish her. It is just one on the little quivering hand—then Peggy rushes out of doors to sob herself tired in the woods. Then she tells her father, and old Zeke Barton awaits the teacher as he passes and fells him with a blow. It is thus that Peggy finds him later. Fearful for his life she dips handfuls of water and washes his face with it, imploring him in wild words to live for her sake; to forgive her, for she loves him. He comes to, slowly, and hears her. Assured that he is all right, she rushes away. But she does not come to school any more. But she learns that the lady is Marsden's sister and that she is going away and then she returns to school and is received by Marsden with open arms and sobs her love on his shoulder.

MAJESTIC.

A MIX-UP IN PEDIGREES (Oct. 5).—Robert Forsythe was an elderly widower of wealth who prided himself upon his distinguished lineage.

Muriel, his daughter, did not share her father's views on pedigrees. A young society man was favored by her father as her future husband, but she reserved her smiles for a young business man who had no "family connections" to recommend him. Mr. Forsythe did not approve of Brown, and the young merchant was peremptorily refused. "He is not of our station in life, dear," he told his daughter, "and is unfit to marry you." "I don't believe that Paul's family is any better than Bob's," the girl retorted scornfully. The father wrote to an old genealogist to trace the family history of the two men. The genealogist's report stated that Devere, the young society man, was descended from one of the French Kings, While Brown had an ancestor who was hanged for stealing hogs. The genealogist gave the report to his stenographer to deliver. She had reason to like Brown, and when the report was delivered to Mr. Forsythe it was so altered that he ordered Devere out of the house, and gladly gave his consent to his daughter's engagement to Brown.

THE HERITAGE (Oct. 7).—Helen Lawson is trained almost from childhood to know the full joys of physical and intellectual health and purity. She comes to look upon life as a glorious field for adventure, but one that is not devoid of the necessity to face with courage the ills which will inevitably confront all. Her attitude in this respect is conveyed by a motto which she purchases while on a shopping tour with her mother. Ultimately, Helen meets Harwood and finally consents to be his wife. The wedding day is but a month distant when, through reading a letter which has dropped from Harwood's pocket, Helen believes that she has discovered that his past life has not been clean. Helen, stricken with grief, confronts Harwood with the letter and learns that her fears have not been unfounded. A struggle between her ideals and her selfish love for Harwood ensues. Love has apparently triumphed over ideals, when, most unexpectedly, an incident of her former life is enacted, and Helen forever turns away from Harwood.

THE ICE MAN'S REVENGE (Oct. 11).—Mike, a husky ice man, is in love with Delia, a servant girl. Smith, a fireman, meets Delia and she forsakes Mike. The ice man is unconsolable over his loss.

The family that employs Delia goes away and Delia is left in charge. Smith invites her to go with him to the ball of the Daniel Slattery Association, and she consents. Her mistress's clothes are so fine, and she is sure that she would look well in them that in an evil moment she yields to temptation and goes to the ball arrayed in them. She is belle of the ball and Smith is proud that he is her escort, while poor Mike stands gloomily by, brooding over his wrongs.

The Harrisons return unexpectedly from their visit and Mrs. Harrison discovers that some of her clothes are missing. A jealous maid tells of Delia's act and the Harrisons, accompanied by a policeman, go to the scene of Delia's triumph. Delia is shorn of her borrowed finery while the fickle fireman and her former admirers laughed at her plight, but Mike, her former admirer, comes to her assistance, secures clothes for her, and earns her undying devotion and gratitude.

THANHOUSER.

LOUIE, THE LIFE SAVER (Oct. 7).—Louie was lazy, and owing to a diet of flashy novels, he grew up to be a worthless young man. He had a job in an office, but when summer came, gave it up and hied himself to the seashore, securing a place as life guard. He decided after a few days that there was one girl who would suit him. She was very pretty, and accompanied by an elderly gentleman, undoubtedly her father. Louie tried to scrape an acquaintance with her in the water, but failed. Just the same his chance came. The girl was seized with cramps, and Louie gallantly rescued her. Everything was going just the way things did in the yellow backed novels. But he was rudely awakened, however, for the next day the broker called to thank him. Then Louie learned to his sorrow, that the "girl" was the old man's wife, and that old men are sometimes stingy with their money.

A DAUGHTER WORTH WHILE (Oct. 10).—The president of the big corporation was able and just, and did not realize that there was an effort to displace him. The head of the conspiracy was the vice-president of the company, who posed as one of his chief's most loyal friends. Secretly, however, he was organizing certain dissatisfied stockholders, and expected that he would succeed to the place of his superior.

A day or so before the annual meeting, the president was striken at his summer home. He confidently sent for the vice-president, gave him the proxies for his stock, and believed that everything would be clear sailing. Then the conspirator went away, met one of his allies, boastingly told him of his success. Fortunately for the sick man, his daughter gained wind of the plot, and took steps to defeat it. She induced her father to give her a new proxy, and started for the mainland. She missed the ferryboat and boldly took a neighbor's yacht and ran it across the bay. She arrived at the mainland too late to catch the last train, but she commandeered an automobile, and by a wild ride was able to reach the board room in time to save her father.

THE BULLY (Oct. 10).—Village school comedy: class of boys take advantage of old gray-headed schoolmaster and become very unruly. The master attempts to chastise them, and led by the bully they desert the school in a body, but come flocking back when a young lady supersedes the old schoolmaster. The bully falls in love with the new teacher, shows it in every way, coming to school in his best store clothes, bringing bouquets in the morning and threatening the other scholars if they attempt to annoy the school "marm." The bully escorts the school "marm" home after school and one day proposes. She laughingly rejects him. The old schoolmaster's son in the meantime returns from college and begins paying attention to the young lady, whereupon the bully vows vengeance and starts to disrupt the class. The old schoolmaster's son happens to be passing at the time when the revolt was at its height; he steps in and endeavors to give the bully a thrashing, which is done with difficulty. The bully is expelled from school and the school "marm" becomes daughter-in-law-to-be of the old schoolmaster.

VENETIAN ROMANCE (Oct. 17).—Paola, a young Venetian captain, receives instructions and a copy of the plan of the campaign to be brought against their enemy, the Genoese, from the Counsel of Ten, the rulers of Venice. Carlo, a Genoese spy, from his place of hiding among the draperies of the room, takes in the whole scene and therefore plans to steal the plans for both patriotic and personal reasons. Carlo and Paola are both in love with Marguerita, who returns Paola's love. Carlo, through the connivance of Paola's servant, steals the plan from his apartment. Carlo then goes before the counsel and accuses Paola of being a traitor. Counsel then calls on Paola to return the plans. He endeavors to do so by going to his apartment and there discovers that they have been stolen. He returns and tries to explain to the council, but is thrown into prison as a traitor. Marguerita, suspecting the true nature of affairs, dresses herself in male attire and invades Carlo's apartment, finds the plans in a secret panel and hides them on her person. Carlo then enters his apartment and demands to know the cavalier's business and just then discovers the secret panel is open. With an oath, he jerks the large cavalier from her head, which allows her hair to fall and him to discover it is a woman. Marguerita draws her sword and a wicked sword fight ensues, in which she is disarmed. In the meantime her servants who had been waiting for her below in a gondola, seeing Carlo enter the house, go for assistance, which arrives as Carlo is embracing Marguerita. Andreas, Marguerita's father, attacks Carlo and in a terrific sword combat drives Carlo back foot by foot, until he is close to an open window, through which he leaps into the river, where he is captured, brought to the Council of Ten, where he is sentenced to die by torture. Paola in the meantime being freed, and the end is Paola asking Marguerita's hand of her father, which he gives with his blessing.

HANDCUFFED FOR LIFE (Oct. 10).—The fashionable May O'Malley gets tired of doing nothing and yearns to make her mark in the world. One day she has a vision of herself performing great deeds as a policewoman, and that settles it. She persuades her father, an influential man, to get her a job. Thinking to cure her, he telephones to the district captain, and both in a humorous mood decide to give her her way. May, prepared with a flash light lantern and a dainty pearl revolver, arrives at the station house full of her importance. The policemen have a good laugh; as that does not phase her, they send her on the trail of "Bosco Pete." She gets in the house of a millionaire named Brown. After many ludicrous situations, May handcuffs his right hand to her left and brings him to the police station. When she arrives at the station house with her prisoner, she finds she has lost the key to the handcuffs through a hole in her stocking, which cannot be found. She must therefore, stay locked to Brown, he in the cell and she outside nearly crying. Brown tries to console her to no end. May's father arrives just in the middle of this trying situation to see how things are progressing. He has found the key to the handcuffs. He releases May and she hides her head on his shoulder. After gaining her self-control, she presents her revolver to the captain, who promises to wear it for a watch charm. When May learns who Brown is she gives him her both hands and they have a good, hearty laugh and are later handcuffed for life.

THE LITTLE HUNCHBACK (Oct. 8).—In Casgar, on the utmost boundary of Tartary, lived a tailor and his pretty wife. One day a little hunchback seated himself at the shop door and began to sing and play on a tabor. The tailor invited the hunchback in to entertain his wife. The hospitable wife immediately placed a dish of fish before the men. The hunchback swallows a bone and chokes to death. The accident greatly alarms the tailor, who fearing the magistrate will hear of it, plans to get rid of the corpse. They carry the body to the house of the Jewish doctor and put it at the bottom of a steep flight of stairs, then hastily run away. The doctor, coming down the stairs without a light, falls upon the corpse. He thinks he has killed a poor, sick fellow coming for treatment. Stealthily, the doctor and his wife carry the body to the terrace of their house and throw it down the chimney of their Mussulman neighbor. The Mussulman is one of the Sultan's purveyors; coming into the room, sees a man at his chimney. Thinking he is a robber, he strikes him a good blow with a stick. The corpse falls on the floor, and he thinks he has killed the man. In great distress and fear he carries the body to the end of the street and places it in an upright position against a shop. A rich Christian merchant, coming home from a night's festivities, jostles into the corpse, which falls upon him. Thinking he is being attacked by a thief he throws him down, calling "Thief." The outcry alarms the watch, and finding a Christian beating a Mussulman, they arrest the merchant and bring him to the magistrate. The magistrate recognizes the hunchback as the Sultan's buffoon, and orders death to the merchant. Just as he is about to be hanged, the purveyor comes along proclaiming himself the guilty party. The executioner releases the merchant and puts the rope around the purveyor's neck. Just then the voice of the Jewish doctor calls for the execution to be suspended. The Jewish doctor tells his story and is condemned in the place of the purveyor. The rope is just about to go around the doctor's neck when the tailor rushes in to tell his story. The Sultan, hearing of the mixup, commands them all to his presence, and though he grieves for his buffoon, he pardons all concerned in his favorite's death.

GAUMONT.

A CHORUS GIRL'S ROMANCE (2 parts—Oct. 7).—Nellie Palmer's attractiveness almost leads to her death in a dismal underground dungeon. As principal dancer and chorus singer at the Imperial Theater she is a popular young woman with many admirers. A rich American, William J. Smithson, is so enamored of her that when repulsed he goes to her parents and offers to marry Nellie. Nellie is already engaged, and although her fiancé is only a young bank clerk, her love is proof against the advantages offered by an alliance with the American millionaire.

Smithson has a private secretary, one John Davis, a scheming, smooth, oily, suave young man. Davis learns that his employer means to divide his wealth between Nellie and Davis, so he arranges that Mr. Smithson shall not cumber the earth much longer, by substituting a deleterious compound for the medicine which the doctor has prescribed. Smithson makes his will, leaving the whole of his fortune to be equally shared between Nellie and his secretary, and in the event of one pre-deceasing the other, the whole amount is to go to the survivor. Davis being shown this will immediately begins scheming to obtain the whole of the money. Fate plays into his hands. He reads in a paper that the "Eden Girls" with Nellie Palmer at their head, have been engaged to dance and sing at Triveau Lodge on the invitation of Count and Countess Valnoise, and that the girls would be conveyed by motor-car to and from the lodge. So he goes to the garage and punctures the tires on both of the front wheels. Naturally a breakdown occurs and the girls troop off to walk to the nearest house, Nellie being the last to leave the car. Davis stealthily follows her, and at a favorable moment he captures and gags her, conveying the unconscious girl to a filthy underground dungeon. When Nellie regains her consciousness she finds a revolver and a phial of poison by her side, together with a note bidding her take her choice of death, as she will never leave the place alive.

A poacher pursued by two keepers eludes them by gaining an entrance to the dungeon by way of a secret passage through a well in the grounds, and he reaches his haven of refuge just as Nellie sinks to the ground with a cry of despair. This cry proves her salvation. Knowing the secret of the well the poacher makes his way into the dungeon and finds the terrified Nellie, who relates what has happened. They decide to lay a trap for the crafty Davis, and arrange that when the criminal returns he shall find Nellie apparently dead, having committed suicide. Davis does return and is gratified that Nellie has accepted one of the two courses and is dead. He removes the "body" from the dungeon and carries Nell into a wood, intending to leave the "body" there. Laying her down, he is astonished to find himself looking into the barrel of a revolver. Before he can recover his surprise the poacher has come

COMPENSARC

This Machine cuts 2/3 from your Light Bills

Mr. Manager

If you are on a 110 or 220 volt circuit and you are using a rheostat to reduce the voltage to 35 at the arc in your lamp, you are paying for 2/3 more "juice" than you are actually using. Can you afford to waste all this energy supplied from the line, over and above what you really need?

The Fort Wayne Compensarc

saves all this waste by reducing the voltage without losing any: makes a clearer, whiter, steadier light, and eliminates all danger of fires caused by overheated rheostats.

We have a little 22 page booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat" that we want to send you. It will tell you plainly how you can make a big saving and a better light. Send us your name and address.

A MATRIMONIAL RAFFLE (Oct. 9).—Ever on the lookout for amusement, and being of a speculative turn of mind, Simple Simon sees a fine chance in the offer made by Dale's Matrimonial Bureau, which is organizing a weekly matrimonial raffle, wherein it is possible to win a wife with a fortune varying from $2.50 to half a million dollars. This is no "con game," and to make it interesting the faces of the ladies are hidden and their ages not revealed. Simon's luck is in. He wins a prize, and he is so elated by his success that he makes a bee line for the prizes and seizes his bride-to-be. Horrors! His "win" is a lady of uncertain age, decidedly verging on the sere and yellow. Simon cannot foreswear his bargain, and the marriage is almost completed when his heart fails him and he runs away. Being captured, the organizer of the raffle points out that Simon has held his ticket upside down, making 6 look like 9, and his real prize, No. 6, is a very charming young damoiselle.

CASABLANCA, IN PICTURESQUE MOROCCO (Oct. 9).—Opening with a general view of the town, the pictures show the busy bazaar quarter, where numerous kinds of trades are represented. Water-carriers and toy-makers jostle one another in the narrow streets, spice merchants shout the merits of their goods and quarrel among themselves, while the boat makers' insistent hammering adds to the clamor. An interesting sight is the changing of the guard, for strict surveillance about the city is still very necessary.

FEATURES

TRUE FEATURES.

THE HUMAN TORPEDO (Feature Release—3 parts).—The courage of women is often blind when love speaks. A woman finds herself in this strangest of predicaments: she faces the man whom she promised to marry after having given her hand to another. The deserted lover has the woman absolutely in his power; he is an officer in the Turkish army and the woman has just been brought before him as a captive. He tells her he will keep her in death as he cannot have her in life and prepares to embark in a torpedo boat, taking the woman with him after he had bored a hole in the little destroyer. Death seems certain to the woman, when the loyalty of a poor wretch whom she befriended in distress presents a means of salvation.

Omar Bey is the Turkish ambassador at the [illegible] of Greece and Helena, a beautiful Greek [illegible], has fallen in love with him. They [illegible] troth. She is to join her lover in [illegible] before the Spring comes, the [illegible] over the Balkans-Greek arms ag[illegible] foe and Helena, yielding to the demands of her parents, gives her hand in marriage to Demos, one of her own countrymen and one of the commanders of the Greek fleet. The war goes on week after week and month after month. Helena has joined the army as a nurse and has found contentment in her marriage. It so happens that Helena falls into the hands of the Turks and into the hands of the man she had promised to marry.

Relief to Helena seems impossible. The Turkish army is entrenched along the coast and before the Greek vessels can land their troops, Omar Bey will have dragged his fair victim to the bottom of the sea. The faithful servitor of Helena, whom she had years ago saved from an angry mob in Athens, proposes to hide her in a torpedo and to be shot across the waters on board the ironclad commanded by Demos, her husband. Helena does not hesitate a moment. Bravely she allows her humble friend to place her in a torpedo. The friend arranges to have the dangers of death minimized by wrapping Helena in big wads of cotton. The torpedo with its human freight is hurled toward the Greek warship, but it falls short of its aim, dropping into the water. It is seized by Greek sailors. Upon opening the projectile it is found to contain Helena. Helena is united to her husband, while the Turkish officer finds too late that his develish scheme has been foiled.

APEX.

The CRIME ON THE COAST (Feature Subject—3 parts).—Patrick Masters, a poor fisherman, learns that his son, Sam, has run into debt. He writes to Mr. Burrows, a friend of his youth, who has since grown wealthy, asking him for advice. Mr. Burrows pays a visit to Masters and is followed to the fisherman's cottage by Tanala, a Greek, who is in love with Mrs. Burrows. Tanala fires through the window of the cottage mortally wounding Burrows. He is pursued by Patrick Masters, but manages to elude him. Meanwhile Burrows succeeds in scrawling a few words in a book on the table before him, ere he falls back dead. The book containing the note is put away in a drawer with its precious message unseen, and Patrick Masters is tried and convicted for the murder of Burrows.

A year passes by, and poor old Masters has died in prison. Tanala, the Greek, is now engaged to Mrs. Burrows. Her daughter, Fifi, is strongly opposed to the match, and does all in her power to prevent it. Sam Masters, the ne'er-do-well son of the dead fisherman, finds the book containing the message, "I have been shot by Tanala—John Burrows," and determines to blackmail the Greek.

Young Masters visits Tanala's home, and his interview with Tanala is overheard by Fifi. Tanala gives Sam a small sum of money, and secretly tears the incriminating page out of the book. Then he returns the book to the fisherman, telling him that he may do what he will with it. Fifi Burrows steals the torn out page and hides it in the base of a statuette. Later, Sam, discovering that Tanala has outwitted him, throws himself into the sea and is drowned.

Sam's dead body is recovered from the sea and the book is also found. On examination, it is discovered that the message written in ink in the book has penetrated through to another page, and the evidence against Tanala remains unaltered. Mrs. Masters is summoned to attend Fifi, who is ill, and the girl produces the leaf she has hidden in the statuette, exposing Tanala's villainy in time to prevent his marriage to her mother.

RED POWDER (Feature Subject—3 parts).—Charles Keil, a young chemist, discovers an explosive composition of such tremendous power that it gives promise of revolutionizing many industries. During his explorative work, Dr. Joseph Reimer, a laboratory colleague, jealous of Keil's success, abstracts his formulae from Keil's notebook. After a number of demonstrations that prove the value of the discovery, a moment's carelessness causes an explosion that wrecks the laboratory and buries both men in the burning debris. They are rescued by firemen and taken to a hospital, where Kiel dies, but not until he had imparted a mystic message to his fiancee, Lucy—the final ingredient of the precious "Red Powder," which had never been included in any formulae he had intrusted to writing.

Dr. Reimer, in possession of what he believes to be the complete formula, also secures the limited existing supply of "Red Powder" and claiming the discovery as his own, proceeds to give a series of demonstrations that result in a large bank becoming interested in its promotion. Angered by this injustice, Lucy appears before the bank directors and charges Dr. Reimer with the theft, but she is regarded as having been crazed by the death of her sweetheart, and Reimer, who has married the daughter of one of the bank directors, is hailed as a great discoverer.

Further experiments on land and sea increase Reimer's fame, and result in another accident through a premature explosion, but Reimer escapes death again. Nemesis is on his trail, however, in the form of a detective retained by Lucy. The detective secures employment in Reimer's laboratory, and soon when the original supply of "Red Powder' gives out, watches Reimer endeavoring to create a new supply. The thief cannot understand his failure to get results. Not knowing his stolen formula is incomplete, he surreptitiously consults it again and again, until the detective watching him through the agency of a mirror, discerns the dead chemist's writing. He immediately telegraphs the bank that Reimer is a fraud, but it is too late. The failure of the explosive made by Reimer to fulfill its function has embarrassed several big concerns that depended upon it; the bank in turn totters and collapses, and the community is in a state of frenzy with thousands out of employment, when word reaches the angry crowd that Reimer's treachery is responsible for the widespread ruin. Riots follow; Reimer's home is stoned and a flying missile overturns a lamp, starting a fire. With his wife and little child, Dr. Reimer flees for his life. Just as the frenzied mob is about to seize him, Dr. Reimer clutches the chain of a huge derrick and with his wife and child clinging to him, is swung far over the heads of the rioters and in safety over the spreading fire to the approaching police reserves.

Accusation pursues him even there. A search is made and the incriminating writing is found. Dr. Reimer is arrested, but escapes. After an exciting chase, he breaks down. His death follows at the hospital where he is taken, but not before he has sought forgiveness from Lucy and his family.

BILLINGTON GARWOOD JOY

A MIX UP IN PEDIGREES

"THE-GIRL-THE-CRITIC-FOUND"

FRANCELIA BILLINGTON

Works Well with

"BILLY" GARWOOD and EARNEST JOY

in this Majestic Picture!

"A MIX-UP IN PEDIGREES," Sunday, October 5th, is the reel and it features the Louis Reeves Harrison girl, Miss Billington—Mr. Harrison pointed her out in a small part in a big production he reviewed last Spring, and we instantly signed her for "stock." She has more than vindicated the critic's judgment and our own; it has been a short leap from the small part to the strong lead—in "A Mix-Up in Pedigrees," for instance. See Francella Billington's work in this to learn how promising talent can be developed into perfect material under New Majestic stage direction. Of course, Garwood and Joy are more pleasing than ever in this farce. There are no favorites like New Majestic favorites!

Other Releases of the Week:

"THE HERITAGE," strong drama, out Tuesday, Oct. 7.

"THE ICE MAN'S REVENGE," perfection comedy, out Saturday, Oct. 11.

The Main Release of the Month

is still "SAPHO," with Florence Roberts, that we are circulating on the state rights plan. It is filling big theaters everywhere. As for small theaters they just won't be able to hold the crowds! Has your small theater asked for booking yet? Even as a police-watched play, "SAPHO" never drew people as she does now as a clean Florence Roberts photoplay.

A Great Two-Reel "REGULAR" Is Coming

in "THE VAN WARDEN RUBIES," which has a feature cast and feature paper. It's a marvelous mystery story, full of superb acting. You will be kept guessing clear to the finish. Regular release of Sunday, Oct. 12.

Nicholas Power Company, Wexford, Mich., 9-15-13
New York City.

Dear Sirs:—

Have a Power's No. 6, not A, that I bought of you 1911. Can I get you to put a loop setter on it, also repair Power's Inductor that the wire has got bent from rough handling?

I have run your No. 6 three years and all other makes of M. P. machines for fifteen years, but your machine is so far ahead of the rest for steadiness, simplicity and reliability that I can only see one M. P. Machine and that is Power's No. 6.

Yours very truly,

THE THANHOUSER THREE-A-WEEK urges every theater that does "good business" with a good feature to investigate the goodness of their FOUR REEL Mutual specials,

"MOTHS," with Maude Fealy — and "ROBIN HOOD"

The stirring life of the great adventurer of the Middle Ages is here shown properly in black and white pictures for the first time. Every man, woman and child knows the story. This is the big, popular film of the Fall. See any Mutual Program Exchange for special terms.

Get "MOTHS!" Get "ROBIN HOOD!" Get "MOTHS!" Get "ROBIN HOOD"

THE NEW THREE

(Sunday, October 12) "A DEEP SEA LIAR"

The second of the famous "by the sea" productions made at Cape May by a special company. A romantic maiden is told by a romancer that he is owner of a yacht whose crew mutinied and flung him overboard. He proves to be a mere deckhand who had fallen overboard while intoxicated!

(Tuesday, October 14) "THE PLOT AGAINST THE GOVERNOR" A Subject of the Hour—in Two Reels

Governor James Cruze ignores the State machine in making appointments and the machine proceeds to "get" him. Now, as the papers are showing day by day, "getting" a governor is a simple pastime for some bosses, but the boss who was "after" Cruze had Mignon Anderson for his stenographer and she did not think the State and the people would benefit by the Governor's retirement. In the end she saved the governor. It makes two gripping reels that will hit the public better at this time than could any other kind of political story imaginable.

(Friday, October 17) "A PEACEFUL VICTORY"

There was a great strike, and the men were being beaten. Then suddenly the manufacturer gave in! None were more greatly surprised at the surrender than the men themselves and now, for the first time, the outer world is apprised of the reason. It lay with a girl. Flo La Badie and William Russell do notable "team" work in this.

COMING! More "By-the-Sea" stories from Cape May, "Beauty in the Seashell" (Sun., Oct. 19), and "The Mystery of the Haunted Hotel" (Tues., Oct. 21).

COMING! Riley Chamberlin in "The Old Folks at Home" (Fri., Oct. 24), and "How Filmy Won His Sweetheart" (Tues., Oct. 28).

COMING! Both the Kidlet and the Twins in "The Children's Hour," "Jack and the Beanstalk," and "The Big Beautiful Doll," released in November.

"BRONCHO BILLY GETS SQUARE."

(IN TWO PARTS)

RELEASED FRIDAY, OCTOBER 17th!

Now here's an opportunity of a lifetime for you, Mr. Exhibitor. If you do not clean up big receipts on this feature, it will be your fault. Just think of it, this is the first two reel "Broncho Billy" picture ever produced and released. The story is well photographed and the portrayal is excellent. Better book it today, before it slips your mind. See Mr. Anderson in an unusual role. Heralds and posters now ready.

Released Tuesday, October 14th.

"THREE SCRAPS OF PAPER."

A drama of more than usual interest with a touch of pathos that will make you remember this story. Ruth Stonehouse, E. H. Calvert, Thomas Commerford and Eleanor Kahn at your service.

---

Released Wednesday, October 15th.

"THEIR WATERLOO."

This is absolutely a feature comedy. A world beater from start to finish. Book this today.

---

Released Thursday, October 16th.

"A BORROWED IDENTITY."

A Western comedy-drama with unusual and interesting situations. Marguerite Clayton, the California beauty, featured.

---

Released Saturday, October 18th.

"ALKALI" IKE AND THE WILDMAN.

You certainly know the drawing quality of "Alkali" Ike pictures by this time. "'Alkali' Ike and the Wildman," is a dandy. Be sure and book it. Augustus Carney, the "Gibraltar of Fun," featured.

Coming October 24th! Coming October 24th!

"THE LOVE LUTE OF ROMANY."

(IN TWO PARTS)

A dramatic story of the gypsies, photographed at Ithaca, New York. Many exciting and thrilling scenes throughout this production make it a box-office attraction of more than ordinary pulling power. The theme is new and one to be remembered long. A splendid cast, excellent backgrounds and climacteric events of unusual number. Book this feature now. Heralds and posters ready.

Use the brains

Answer this question: How on earth can any film manufacturer in the world, especially the little "fly-by-nights" who are now dumping their wares on the market, the so-called "state-righters," the peddlers of foreign trash, the people who have flashy posters but nothing back of them — how on earth can such people hope to give you real features that can compare with the features produced by the largest film manufacturing concern in the universe? USE THE BRAINS GOD GAVE YOU!

God gave you!

The Universal has the best known stars in the film business. It has the brainiest stage directors. It spends more money and gets better results than any other company in the world. It has the most extensive equipment in the whole film world. Its scenario department is now by far the cleverest in the trade. The Universal's six features every week are far better than any you can secure elsewhere, and yet some of you are still booking trash from every Tom, Dick and Harry who comes along with a flashy poster and a lengthy subject under his arm. USE THE BRAINS GOD GAVE YOU!

You can't succeed in the film business with half-stewed, weak-spined, warmed-over methods. The man who hustles, the man who watches the market like a keen-eyed hawk, the man who demands the best and sees that he gets it is the man who is going to survive in this exhibition business. # rotten films!

I will admit that the Universal has had some rotten pictures on its program. But so has every other program. We fought and bled and almost died to reach the point where we could shelve poor productions instead of releasing them. And we've reached that point. Those of you who are NOT using Universal films are showing several rotten pictures every week mixed in with your good ones. That's why you have to go out and book the so-called state-right stuff and give away profits that rightfully belong in your own bank account. USE THE BRAINS GOD GAVE YOU!

How much longer are you going to be fool enough to throw your money away? Don't you know that conditions change like lightning in this business? Just because you didn't like the Universal program some weeks or months ago is no reason for not even looking at it now. Do you know that the Universal exchanges, in spite of the fact that they offer you better films than any other exchanges, are actually more reasonable in price? Doesn't that mean anything to you? ## Business-getting Literature

BESIDES the attractive two-color artistic booklet, invaluable as a circular for business-getting purposes, are issued interesting heralds, four kinds of one-sheets, two kinds of threes and a six-sheet, together with announcement slides, photo lobby displays and other miscellaneous material. One three-sheet shows fight between lion and tiger. Six-sheet shows battle between English and Hindu soldiers.

Preface

THE atmosphere in this story of thrill and unique sensationalism is pungent with the aroma of mysterious, treacherous and voluptuous India. The spectacle of woman being traded like merchandise and cattle, represents an interesting problem of modern civilization in the East. The animal interest interwoven with the theme and plot produces a combination at once forcefully interesting and compelling. To it all are added touches of genius reflecting the personalities of Countess de Marstini in the title role and the artistry of Herbert Blaché, the producing director.

Lion-Tiger Encounter

THE encounter between the man and the lioness, and the lioness and the tiger are scenes that are depicted here for the first time in the history of the world. The struggle between beast and beast lasted six hours and more than two thousand feet of film were taken, but about two hundred used in picture. It became a test of endurance and the lioness finally fell from exhaustion and the intermittent clawing of the tiger.

BETWEEN LION AND TIGER

The Story in Phrases

TORU, beautiful daughter of a Hindu miser, inspires the Rajah with an inordinate desire for her acquisition to his Harem. She fights—is imprisoned—lover comes to her rescue with pet tiger—almost succeeds—is recaptured—lover sentenced to be the victim of his own pet—plan unsuccessful—lion is forced into his cell to destroy him and his tiger—Toru views the torture from the royal box—thrilling encounter—first, man and lion—then lion and tiger. Lion killed—Rajah undertakes to execute prisoner himself and is mauled to death by tiger—lover and tiger escape. The successor to throne has Toru sentenced to be burned at altar of fire—but English soldiers arrive in time to prevent outrage.

IT'S THE AVERAGE

Almost any service gives you a good picture occasionally. But your house isn't judged by its special performances. You can't tell the public to judge you by one program and overlook another.

General Film goes on steadily producing the best single reel and multiple features that can be obtained today. Sometimes one shoots high up above everything you can remember. That kind of picture marks an epoch. We try to make them all that way. And

"The Finger Print"

Selig. Two Reels. Released Oct. 20.

Suppose you were a detective playing cards with a man whom you suspected of a pearl robbery. Would it occur to you to ink your cuff, brush it against his fingers and then use his cards as finger-print evidence? That's the turning point in this gripping story of two college room-mates, a girl, a gang of gamblers and a great detective.

"A Daughter of the Underworld"

Kalem. Two Reels.

Released Oct. 22.

A minister's adoption of an unfortunate girl whose life has been wholly vicious starts this remarkable feature. The climax comes when the girl returns to the underworld to exonerate her benefactor from a murder charge. She finds the real murderer—her brother.

"The Wheels of Justice"

Cines-Kleine. Two Reels.

Released Oct. 21.

An intense story centering about the supposed murder of a successful novelist. In reality he is saved by peasants and finds the love of one of them. One episode is the falling of a bridge, plunging two men into the water. Wonderful realism in beautiful exteriors.

"The Evil Eye"

Lubin. Two Reels. Released Oct. 23.

People thought Don Alma had the evil eye, because the power of his glance had once saved him from a lion. The beautiful Sobre was warned against him, but when once she met him she found the emotion in her heart wasn't fear—it was love. A beautiful story of strong personality in a romantic setting.

General Film Company, (Inc.)

THAT COUNTS!

because we do try to make them all epoch-making pictures, we never drop below an average that is consistently higher than the most spectacular and widely-heralded grand-stand plays of every other service.

Take these eight features—typical. No matter when your patrons drop in, they won't see a weak picture—they won't go away disgusted by a filler. There are no fillers in General Film Service. Book it.

"The Death Song"

Patheplay. Two Reels.

Released Oct. 23.

She was just his wife until she found she had a voice—but then she became an artiste with a career. It brought her money and fame and the love of a celebrated composer. The husband was left behind—until he realized it. What he did and how it affected the other two—that's the crux of this big, effective picture.

"Silas Marner"

All the resources of the Edison studios have been called into play to make this adaptation of George Eliot's novel all that it should be. The theme of the old miser awakened into a new life of tenderness and sympathy by the coming of a little girl into his life has made a masterpiece for the films.

"The Love Lute of Romany"

Essanay. Two Reels.

Romany—the land of romance! Its people are different from the rest of us, and when the lovely gypsy girl was thrown by circumstance between two young lovers, the call of the open road led her safely out of their lives. Exquisite in conception is this idyll of love and the great outdoors.

"The Next Generation"

Vitagraph. Two Reels.

Released Oct. 25.

A young ship-designer finds a flaw in the plans which his uncle has made for a new liner. Yet the older man, jealous of his nephew's skill, succeeds in having the great four-funneled ship launched. In mid-ocean, with gayety at its height, the disastrous shock comes. Then panic, fighting for the lifeboats. Fearful, powerful realism here.

The Rajah's Diamond Rose

(Release Tuesday, October 28)

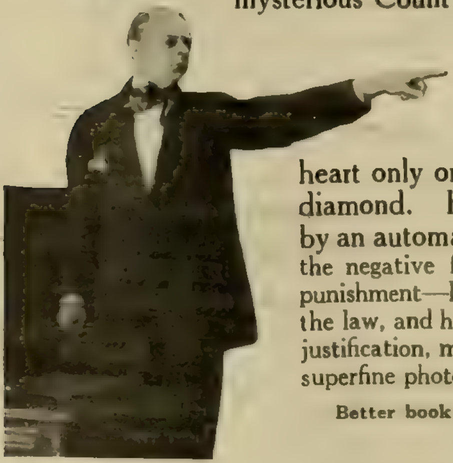
An enchanting story, like a yarn from Stevenson or Poe. Charged brimful with delightful adventure—one of the very best yet made by ECLIPSE!



Jamie Sandoz, a rich young man, visiting in Paris, meets the mysterious Count Seroff, who shows him a diamond of remarkable size and beauty. Jamie disappears from the country a disgraced man.

A year later Jamie's sister, Ophelia, goes to Paris. She agrees to marry her sweetheart only on condition that he steal the Count's great diamond. He does so—only to be caught red-handed by an automatic camera. Count Seroff offers to sell him the negative for $25,000. How the Count finally met a just punishment—how the young man cleared himself in the eyes of the law, and how Ophelia's faith in her brother proved its own justification, make an absorbing story that fairly sparkles with superfine photography, splendid situations and convincing acting.

* * * SILAS MARNER

From the Famous Novel by George Eliot

In Two Reels Released Friday, October 24th

George Eliot's novel is undoubtedly one of the most universally known and liked of all the works of fiction. Her wonderful gift of character drawing and her genius as a dramatic writer are clearly displayed in "Silas Marner." We have followed the story very closely, depicting Silas' first stroke of epilepsy in the church, his vigil at the bedside of the dying deacon when William Dane steals the church money and shifts the blame upon Silas. Then the banished Silas becomes a miser, living alone and hoarding his gold. Dunston Cass robs him of his money; Molly, Godfrey's unacknowledged wife, dies in Silas' house on the night of Godfrey's marriage to Nancy, leaving Effie in Silas' care. After sixteen years of duplicity Godfrey tells Nancy that Effie is his child and they offer to take her to their beautiful home. In a highly dramatic scene Silas denounces Godfrey and Effie clings to the old man, refusing to leave him.

Facts and Comments

THE follies and vagaries of censorship under any name or system are again demonstrated in a ruling of the Ohio Board of State Censors regarding a scene in the feature of a well-known and reputable producer. The feature in question deals with life in Cambodia and has a distinct educational value. In the very last scene of the picture, running scarcely more than twenty-five feet, a happy couple of dusky natives are shown with their twin children in a hammock. The children are really new-born babies, and just as the mother picks them out of the hammock the scene comes to a quick curtain.

There is absolutely nothing offensive in this scene. Naked babies are constantly shown in public advertisements printed in every newspaper of the world. To remove even the slightest objection the babies are held with their backs to the camera, or at least away from the camera. Unless we are prepared to maintain that Mother Nature herself ought to be ashamed for allowing babies to be born without any clothes whatever, we cannot possibly find the least fault with this scene. In the Vatican museum there are scores upon scores of little angels on the canvas and in marble, just as unadorned as the dusky little Cambodians and in much franker and bolder positions. Millions of men and women look at these pictures every year without experiencing any perceptible moral shock. It has remained for the censors of Ohio to object. We would like to see this action taken into the courts by either the producer or the exhibitor. That would mean the beginning of the end of "State" censorship.

UNCLE SAM will hereafter take a look at every film that asks permission to come in from other lands, and if the stranger proves to be undesirable it will not be allowed to enter. In another part of this issue THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD prints an interview with the Chief of the Customs in the Treasury Department, which ought to prove interesting and instructive reading. While we remain unalterably opposed to censorship, we think it is a most desirable thing to have an offensive film within the easy reach of Uncle Sam. It is but fair to say that the cheap and nasty producer of certain European products has found plenty of imitators in our own country. The number of "features" plainly designed to appeal and cater to low and depraved tastes is, we are sorry to say, on the increase in this country.

There is every reason to believe that Uncle Sam will be able and willing to make a distinction between the products of well-known producers with a proper sense of their responsibilitiy and the many bad films turned out and shipped here by mushroom concerns without any sense of responsibility whatever. We owe some of our very finest productions to Italy. On the other hand, Italy sends us—with the possible exception of Germany—some of the worst and most reprehensible "features." The same applies with scarcely less force to France, while the stuff we get from England is, with some notable exceptions, entitled to close scrutiny at the custom house.

FROM time to time the melancholy films come in unwelcome quantities. The death-bed scenes, the athtetics of the dying villains and heroes, the brutal father walloping the "chee-ild" in the cradle, the ladies and gentlemen preparing themselves for a more or less picturesque suicide, the last ceremonies of an execution, etc., etc., are altogether de trop, or, as they say in Chicago, "dee trow." We have too much of this gloomy stuff. There are two or three of our native and foreign producers whom we are constrained to suspect of currying favor with undertakers because of the frequency of their death scenes and "beautiful" funerals. Only recently a paper in Pennsylvania recorded the case of a poor cripple who it was claimed had been driven to suicide by viewing a succession of gloom-dealing films. There are people who love the titillation of the horrible, but they are in the minority by a decided majority. There is no sense in spreading gloom on the screen. People go to moving picture theaters to escape the glooms of life rather than to find them. Gloom in its proper place in the development of a dramatic story is unavoidable, but gloom for gloom's sake is unpardonable. We want the cheerful rather than the cheerless. Tombstones and cemeteries do not look a bit more cheerful on the screen than in reality, and few people want to spend more time than is required by attendance at a funeral in places intended for the burial of the dead. The "gloom" film is entitled to a long vacation.

Pleasing the People

By Louis Reeves Harrison

THE pictured story's infinite variety now and then deals with romance, imaginative tales we strained our eyes to read in the twilight, of old houses, of streets deserted, of slumberous towns, of the enduring charm that is attached to a hint of mystery. "The Romance of an Old House" as a title would cause every grown member of an audience to watch expectantly, because a home that has received the impress of human beings through long years has a personality all its own and has been loved by those who found shelter and comfort within its rooms. It has been the scene of the human drama in all its forms. It has covered the secret lives of those who have come and gone and has gathered into its silences tragedies unwhispered.

There seems to be almost as much pathos in a neglected old house, falling to ruin, as in a broken down human being. When it has passed the spring of its youth, the summer of its glow and the mellow autumn of its gathered experience, it seems almost human in its pitiful decay. We know that it has stories to tell, perhaps secrets to reveal, that it may impart some of its wisdom. Soft steps may still be heard on its floors in the still hours of the night! What screen stories could be told of old houses by having some wanderer penetrate them one after the other and dream of what had passed within their walls!

The philosophy of dreams, with its spiritual suggestions, with its depths unfathomable, can serve its turn in glimpsing the secret history of great men and women. The returning wanderer finds some inanimate object that brings up haunting memories and sits dreaming while spiritual characters step from secret panels and enact a strange drama hitherto unrevealed that brought about some great change in his life and in the life of those he left when he went on his wanderings. It may be shown what turned the scale at some political crisis, what inspired some military leader to win his cause, what was important in his own career and hitherto incomprehensible.

Why are so few screen romances shown? I don't know. It may be because of certain predilections among those exhibitors who demand the sensational, regardless of other values, and do not leave producers of intelligence judgment free. When a producer turns out stuff in response to a supposed demand, he is at his worst. He is bound to commonplace and mechanical. You might as well tell a sincere author what to write. If his story is to have force, beauty and charm, he must write as he is impelled by the directive tendencies of his own mind. The hack producer, like the hack writer, who attempts to respond to an alleged demand, is not convincing, is not even interesting—he comes close to being a joke.

John Kendrick Bangs describes another type, the would-be author, who seeks glory or profit without genius or preparation. "First be sure you write, then go ahead. The first symptom by which you may ascertain whether you write or not will manifest itself in a burning sense of indignation excited by the stories of other people. 'Tush! What rot! I could do better myself with both hands tied behind my back.' If it makes you inordinately jealous every time you see a certain author's name in print, the little scribendi germ has got into your system, and the sooner you get it out the better. The only cure is to write. It has been said by one of our most eminent authors that no man ever learns that he cannot write until he has tried it. Why delay? Acquire the necessary tools and begin."

"Speaking generally, it will be well to have some sort of an idea to write about, at least something remotely resembling an idea. Dullness and imperspicuity are the privilege of the famous, the damnation of the diminutive." "The West has always been a fertile and profitable field for beginners, especially for those who have never been further West than Ninth Avenue, New York. Their lifelong aloofness from the scenes they depict acts as a stimulant to the imagination. They are not hampered by any known facts, and will write therefore with greater freedom and buoyancy. An ordinary industrious beginner, with a liking for killing off Indians by the tribe, instead of one by one, ought to be able to write convincingly without leaving Forty-second Street or getting further west than East Orange, New Jersey."

That is the kind of stuff some exhibitors claim to be pleasing to the public. It may please some people, but there are people who love romance, or history in the vesture of romance, and there are also people who enjoy a pictured story of the inevitable, but a certain great portion of our people would warmly welcome stories of sincere inspiration, especially those attempting a truthful interpretation of life and character. Above all things the public welcomes what is good of its kind. The kind of story may only be limited by decency of subject and treatment—it is the genius of conception and the genius of interpretation in successful combination that wins all hearts in the end. Even our ordinary people, men and women of primitive tastes, are swift to detect insincerity on the part of those who pretend to please them.

The sensational poster has its uses, but intelligent people do not take it seriously—they are not to be so easily misled—and there must be merit within the show unless the exhibitor imagines that he can fool all the people all the time. The poster may well set forth an intense scene, but its effect will be to turn people away after awhile if it is only a lurid lie. A place of entertainment that is all promise and no performance will not survive its infancy, and many of those now dragging along would have a line at the box office if quality of product had been considered first, foremost and all the time.

The exhibitor was at one time in a position helpless and almost hopeless, but it is now time for him to give intelligent consideration to the unformulated taste of his patrons. That means insistent demand for high quality of service, plays by men of genius interpreted by directors and actors of ability, not the insincere and childish photodramas some have been demanding under the impression that there was no permanence in the business. The making of moving pictures is a publishing business requiring art in representing pictorially what is of general interest.

Nauseating stories, or low taste in the treatment of what is naturally clean and virile, either of these means the degradation of the art and consequent loss of standing in civilized communities. A fascinating romance, a delightful bit of characterization that we all recognize, a noble story of struggle for high ideals and joyous success or tragic failure, a tale of mystery that holds us enthralled, whatever the subject matter, ask for the best of its kind and show that kind to the best obtainable musical accompaniment if you would "please the people."

Uncle Sam as Censor

What the U. S. Government Proposes To Do Under the New Tariff Law.

Washington, D. C., October 8, 1913.

THE new tariff law contains the following provision at the end of the film schedule:

"Provided, however, that all photographic films imported under this section shall be subject to such censorship as may be imposed by the Secretary of the Treasury."

It is practically settled that the Treasury Department will not let this provision of the new law go by default. This paragraph dealing with censorship is worded in such a way as to leave the entire matter in the hands of the Treasury. While the Secretary of the Treasury had nothing whatever to do with this legislation, having not even been consulted on the matter, he will establish rules and regulations in order to carry out the legislative intent.

The task of drawing up such proper rules and regulations will be entrusted to Mr. F. M. Halstead, Chief of the Customs. While Mr. Halstead will be under the formal supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury, it is altogether likely that the latter official will not disturb any conclusions which may be reached by Mr. Halstead.

I called upon Mr. Halstead in his office at the Treasury Building and asked him what the plans of his Department were regarding the moving picture censorship provision in the new tariff law. Mr. Halstead is a very busy man at all times and just now he is practically working day and night doing his share toward adjusting conditions to the new tariff.

"You may tell the readers of the Moving Picture World," he said to me, "that no definite plan has been decided upon, but it is altogether probable that we will take positive action under this censorship clause. We may require the importer to either have his films examined and passed upon by this department, or in lieu thereof furnish a bond, say for one year. If during that time complaints about the film reach this office and the complaints are sustained by the evidence, the Department reserves to itself the right to act. I am, of course, only speaking from a moral point of view and do not in any way refer to complaints of any other character.

"It is too early to get a complete and detailed outline of our regulation, but I will say that there will be certain prohibitions. All obscene matter will be rigidly excluded. Another thing that I think will be barred is the film portraying contemporaneous crime or scandal. We will work out the different standards to which the importers will have to conform."

Though a dozen things at once claimed Mr. Halstead's attention, he did not let them interfere with the interview. He plainly showed that he was deeply interested in the subject

"I consider the moving picture of immense value," he continued quite earnestly. "It is not the business of the government to uplift the moving picture, but it is the business of the public to keep to good standards. There is, I know, a lot of talk to the effect that the public demands the abnormal and sensational and thrills of horror and passion, such as hatred and fury, etc. In the first place, I do believe that this demand is as great as is claimed, and in the second place the demand, even if it exists, ought not to be gratified. There is a demand for opium and a good many other forbidden things which society resists for its own good. If I had the power I would deal the cheap melodrama a blow between the eyes. I would like to see the motion picture both here and abroad on the highest plane. Indeed, if I had my way, educational and uplifting alone would be tolerated. Of course, you understand that this is my personal view and that I am not guided in my official action by these personal views. Civilization has come to us by very slow degrees, and the uplift of the motion picture will be gradual. I am not bigoted or intolerant enough to impose my views on others."

Mr. Halstead was interrupted just as he was about to launch into the subject at full speed, and he resumed after the interruption with the remark that children in the audience should never be lost sight of.

"There is too much of the story showing the man who runs away with another man's wife, and there is too much of the coarse and brutal and the horrible in a good many films that I have seen."

"Before adopting any regulations, Mr. Halstead," I asked, "will you give a hearing to the importers of the country?"

"Not unless they specially ask for it," came the quick reply. "If there is any one who wishes to be heard on this subject, I will, of course, be glad to hear from him, but I will not set down any date for a general hearing."

"What about the expense of this censorship if you require a screen examination at any time?"

Mr. Halstead thought for a moment and then remarked:

"Well, I am not sure. If the importers can be made to pay for it under the law, we will make them pay for it, but we will not ask or collect a penny unless we have ample legal warrant to do so."

"How soon do you expect the rules and regulations to be elaborated?"

"I cannot say with any certainty. I may take a week or two and even longer."

Mr. Halstead betrayed not only a great, but very intelligent interest in the moving picture industry. He was anxious to know about the effect which censorship of the foreign-made films would have on the character and quality of the films made in our own country.

"What," he asked, "does the Moving Picture World think of censorship?"

"The Moving Picture World is opposed to censorship on principle, but it believes that the government is well within the limits of its jurisdiction in keeping out the film garbage of Europe."

"The Japanese Sword—Maker"

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS two-reel Melies feature has high educational value. It gives us a fair picture of Old Japan when the feudal aristocracy of the Samurai ruled the land. The story is simple and genuinely dramatic.

A swordmaker renowned for his skill is introduced to one of the feudal lords and commissioned to make a sword. The swordmaker turns out a wonderful blade, which he tests by what is known as the test of iron. A rod of iron is placed in the ground and the finely tempered sword severs the rod at one blow. The swordmaker delighted with his work hides it in a safe place and prepares to present it to the lord. In the night an envious rival steals the precious weapon and substitutes his own sword, which is of baser metal and far poorer temper. When on the next day the lord has the old swordmaker put his sword to the test of iron it fails and the old swordmaker is disgraced. It is not long, however, before the truth becomes known and the old swordmaker is vindicated.

Scene from "The Japanese Swordmaker" (Melies).

Much may be said in praise of the charming outdoor settings of this picture. The quaint architecture of Japan, the curious customs, still in fullest force at the time in which the story is laid, the strange costumes, the elaborate ceremonies of Japanese life, all are shown with great fidelity to life. The picture gives us a good idea, too, of the Japanese way of looking at life and shows the position of women in the scheme of the social life of Old Japan. It is interesting to watch Japanese actors and actresses, so entirely different from our own. One cannot deny the intelligence displayed by the Japanese artists though their standards of acting are at times odd to European eyes. The landscape of Japan has a singular charm and of this the producers have made all possible use. The spectator is struck with the important part which politeness plays in the life of the Japanese, indeed it often seems that this excessive politeness cloaks and hides their real emotions.

"The Japanese Sword Maker" will be released in the week of October 27th and will be placed in the General Film Company's exclusive service list.

"Zuma, the Gipsy" (Cines-Kleine)

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

FOR perfection of detail and general finish, I would recommend "Zuma, the Gipsy" as the finest of the Cines product, in this respect, that I have viewed since "Quo Vadis?" was introduced. It is not my intention by any means to place the subject mentioned in the same class, except as mentioned; but the director of "Zuma, the Gipsy" deserves his meed of praise just as worthily as did the producer of "Quo Vadis?"

At the very outset the spectator is introduced to the members of a traveling gipsy band. He witnesses the arrival of the little caravan in an Italian village and is absorbed at once in the study of these strange nomads—in their manner of living, their daily intercourse, their costumes and their daily work. He notices that, strong though tribal ties may be, cruel wrong is wrought upon the weak by those in power, and is convinced that human nature is the same under whatever garb. He cannot rid himself of the feeling that he is living amid the scenes. Everything is so real, and the illusion is enhanced by the perfect settings and the objects peculiar to the surroundings. He is even introduced to the interior of a wagon that serves as a sleeping place at night, and by gazing curiously at the shadows, he discovers new sights and forms every fraction of a second.

The scenes soon change to those showing life in the villa of a nobleman and his family. Here the same praiseworthy painstaking as to detail is observable at all times. The interiors betray no signs of stage effects; everything points to a well ordered home, where cultured minds and good taste have left their imprints. The scene in this nobleman's home showing the charity fete is imposing, picturesque and altogether attractive. The snake dance of Zuma—the climax of the fete—is full of subtle charm, though some may not look favorably on the writhing reptile that deals her a death wound.

I referred to the "general finish" of the production. This was intended to include the acting of the principals in the cast. Miss Hesperia, a fascinating young lady, appears in the title role. She always forces one to acknowledge her as the central figure although surrounded by other eminent actors and actresses. Among the latter are: A. Mastripietri (the Chilo of "Quo Vadis?"), as the gipsy chief and ringmaster; Thomas Lupi as Count Fossi; Miss Fucci as Countess Fossi; Miss Pina Menichelli as Luciana, the false friend of the Countess, and B. Castellani (the Ursus of "Quo Vadis?"), as the strong man in the gipsy performing ring. Miss Menichelli is especially deserving of mention for her fine portrayal of Luciana, the patrician beauty who tries to wean away Count Fossi from his adorable little wife.

There are several beautiful light effects in these films and the photography is excellent. Some of the scenes have been artistically lightened by tasteful toning.

Zuma, a beautiful gipsy girl, is cruelly treated by the ringmaster of a traveling gipsy show. Count Fossi and his tender-hearted wife pay the ringmaster a large sum of money for his claim to the girl. In her new home she devotes herself to the service of her benefactors.

When the Marchioness Luciana visits her friends, Count and Countess Fossi, she attempts to lure the nobleman from his wife. Zuma, who loves her mistress, watches Luciana and forces her to flee from the house, under pain of death. Now Zuma finds, under self examination, that she herself loves the count. Loyal to her mistress she determines to seek death. At a great charity fete given by the count and countess, she offers to appear in her famous snake dance. The snake secured for the occasion still retains his poison fangs. The count tells Zuma to extract them. Unknown to him and his guests she fails to do so, finding in this way the means of death. "I die happy, as I have always looked after the happiness of my masters," she whispered to her grieving friends as she passed away.

November 4 has been set as the release date.

VITAGRAPH ENTERTAINS BIG BROOKLYN CLUB.

The Vitagraph Company recently entertained the members of the Municipal Club of Brooklyn, which is composed of prominent citizens of the Vitagraph's home borough. There were seventy in the party. They were shown all over the plant, saw pictures in the making, and later, in the projection room of the factory, saw on the screen pictures not yet released. In the evening the club sat down to dinner at a Brighton Beach establishment, where addresses were made by J. Stuart Blackton and John Bunny of the Vitagraph Company, the Rev. William Sheafe Chase and others. William T. Rock, president of the Vitagraph company, was also present.

J. R. FREULER RETURNS FROM EUROPE.

J. R. Freuler, Vice-President of the Mutual Film Corporation, recently returned from Europe, on the Mauretania, after an extended tour of several months through England, Germany, France, Holland and Switzerland. Accompanying him were his wife and two daughters, Gertrude and Loraine.

Mr. Freuler, in addition to enjoying a very pleasant trip, was a careful observer of film conditions in Europe, where he has a number of business interests, which he reports are operating on a most favorable basis. On his return, he spent a number of days in New York, prior to returning home. A warm welcome was accorded him on his arrival at Milwaukee.

THREE "POMPEII" PICTURES.

There promises to be a sufficiency of pictures depicting the "Last Days of Pompeii" on the American market. George Kleine has announced an Ambrosio subject; the Pasquali subject is now running at Wallack's theater, New York City, and W. H. Schofield, formerly connected with the Ambrosio American Company, is said to be on his way to America with another big feature covering the same subject made by the Gloria Film Company, of Turin, Italy.

The Pasquali American Company, which controlled the Pasquali picture, has sold the exhibiting rights for the United States and Canada to the World's Special Feature Film Corporation, of which E. Mandelbaum is president.

Janet of the Dunes

Two-Reel Edison Feature.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THIS is an interesting story of two generations—such stories are usually interesting from the contrasts they afford—carefully adapted from a novel by Harriet T. Comstock. It reads like a novel, and its other merits most worthy of note are the acting of Mabel Trunnelle and the entire play's artistic presentation. Some of the scenes are those a painter of genius would choose for canvas subjects, and Miss Trunnelle's impersonation is a source of perpetual delight, but the release is not without structural defects that can be avoided in future photodramas of the kind if attention is called to them now.

Scene from "Janet of the Dunes" (Edison).

The director wisely chose the extreme eastern end of Long Island for his setting, and he has not only used that bold coast to great advantage in both reels but has given evidence of rare picture sense in his groupings, utilization of back lights and in measurement of values. By the latter expression I mean the preservation of distances, the relations of light and shade and the relations of one object to another which produce a delightful effect upon the eyes and mind of the spectator. Knowledge of values may be acquired, but it is usually instinctive in successful painters of nature.

Scene from "Janet of the Dunes" (Edison).

In all such releases, where the backgrounds are picturesque and the values nicely measured, we feel like asking the operator to stop his projection machine a moment that we may dwell upon the view. Into this "atmosphere" is projected the heroine, a fisherman's daughter of wild beauty and warm impulses. No one watches over her moral safety except "Captain Billy," impersonated by versatile Charles Ogle, a rude, honest and somewhat disinterested suitor. He watches the courtship of a pleasure seeker from the city, a gentleman of leisure impersonated by Herbert Prior, and resents the latter's conduct in abandoning Janet at the end of the summer. He follows up the city man and brings about a "wedding on the dunes."

This forced wedding leads to a forced situation, which would not have been the case if the idea of Steerforth and "Little Emly" in David Copperfield had been carried out by the author. The city man wearies of his bride after she has given birth to a baby, goes away, sends her a check and writes her a note saying that he will be away for some time adding that she "need not bother." Janet is in good circumstances and perfect health; she has her child to care for; her condition is far from being a hopeless one; she has exhibited no criminal tendency; her jealousy has not been excited; she is not insane, yet she is made to abandon her frail infant to the mercies of a rude fisherman, Captain Billy, and destroy herself by drowning.

The act of suicide is not ordinarily committed under such circumstances, and the enormity of taking her own life at the time a tender little human creature has been committed to her care, one of her own creating, makes the act in this case so illogical that spectators will be disturbed by the conspicuous absence of a logical motive. It is too much in the nature of a mother to treasure and fight for her offspring for her to do so under such circumstances unless it be clearly shown that the condition of her mind was such that she was no longer morally responsible for her acts.

It could have been easily shown that the mother was suffering from severe mental disturbance at the time, or in weakened condition, and there were many other ways out of the difficulty. My point is that whatever is illogical in the novel should not, merely on account of fidelity, be repeated in the screen adaptation. The second reel shows Miss Trunnelle as the deserted child grown to sweet girlhood. It looks as though her story was to be a repetition of her mother's experience, but there are many delightful scenes, in which Richard Tucker plays the lover, and a termination of compensating happiness. The whole feature is like one of those novels we read until dusk and then turn on the lights to finish because of sympathetic human interest enlisted.

CARBON TARIFF REDUCTION.

Statement by Hugo Reisinger, Importer of "Electra" Pink Label Carbons.

True to my promise to the framers of the tariff bill at Washington, that I would give the consumer the benefit of any reduction they may make on electric light carbons, I now take pleasure in announcing herewith that my new reduced prices on "Electra" pink label carbons will go into effect immediately, since President Wilson has just signed the Underwood-Simmons tariff bill.

Under the Payne-Aldrich bill the rate of duty on electric light carbons was 65 cents per hundred feet, while through my strenuous efforts in Washington during the framing of the new tariff bill, the rate has been reduced to 40 cents per hundred feet. This is still an unjustified and exorbitant rate of duty, since electric light carbons do not cost more to manufacture in this country than abroad. I have again and again tried to convince the gentlemen of the Committee on Ways and Means. and the Committee on Finance, that 20 cents per hundred feet would more than protect the domestic goods, but unfortunately I have not been successful.

I am, however, glad, in the interest of the consumer, that I at least succeeded in getting a reduction of 25 cents per hundred feet, which, at any rate, will mean quite a saving to the consumers in the United States.

My well known high grade "Electra" pink label carbons, which are known to be the standard of the world, and are used almost exclusively by the great consumers in this country and abroad, can now be bought at a lower price than ever before.

The "Electra" carbons are manufactured by C. Conradty, of Nuernberg, who owns the largest carbon works in the world, and who has been successful in keeping up the superior quality of "Electra" pink label carbons and delivering at all times a uniform quality.

All the ingredients used in the manufacture of "Electra" pink label carbons are made in the factory itself, which is a great factor in delivering a uniform grade of carbons.

I carry on hand in my large warehouse in New York a complete assorted stock of all sizes of "Electra" pink label carbons, and I am therefore able to handle every order and make immediate shipment the day the orders are received.

To be able to reduce my prices gives me great pleasure and I sincerely hope that the trade will appreciate my successful work in the tariff matter.

"The Fall of Constantinople"

(Gaumont)

By George Blaisdell.

THE Gaumont Company will issue on November 1, "The Fall of Constantinople," a three-reel hand-colored subject. It is one of the most pretentious productions that this company has put upon the market. It might be said that there are comparatively few organizations with the facilities for making a picture of this description. That it is entirely of studio manufacture makes the triumph all the more marked. In elaborateness of settings, gorgeousness of costumes, numbers of men and women employed, splendid pageants and artistic and striking ensembles, the production is unusual. The interpretation is of the best, the action at all times being restrained, dignified, as befits the rank of the principals.

The period of the story is 1453. The theme is the siege of the city by Mohammed II and its unsuccessful defense by Emperor Constantine XIII. As the Turks assail the walls of the town the women and children gather in the great church of St. Sophia and offer up prayers. There is an impressive procession in which is carried the statue of the protectress of the city. In the palace Constantine assembles the principal inhabitants and asks pardon of all whom he has injured. The assault on the walls is highly spectacular. In one scene the invaders bring into use a great battering tower, filled with soldiers.

Scene from "The Fall of Constantinople" (Gaumont).

In the third part we see the Turks enter the city by means of an underground tower left open during the fighting. The result is that the defenders of the tower of Romanus find themselves surrounded. Constantine doffs his royal mantle and fights in the ranks, but it is only a moment before he falls. The Turks press on to St. Sophia, where are gathered the women. There are harrowing scenes as the women are bound by the arms and carried off by the soldiers, to be sold into slavery. Later Mohammed makes his entry into the city and takes possession. He consecrates to Islam the marvelous edifice of St. Sophia. "The Fall of Constantinople" will be sure to arouse much attention among film lovers.

"In the Clutch of the Paris Apaches."

In this strong four-part release on October 18, by the Gaumont Company, there is fine acting by little Jean Mary Laurent, a child who shows a dramatic force that would do credit to one older. She wins our sympathy right at the beginning of the picture and she holds it to the end. The story is sensational in so far as it carries melodramatic situations, all of which, by the way, are well handled. The child is the daughter of Captain De Valen, supposed to have been lost in foreign service, and the widow places her in boarding school. Unhappy there, the child escapes and is found by an alleged artist. Later, when the captain returns uninjured, a reward is offered for the recovery of the little one. The father is lured to the haunts of the Apaches. Bosco, a hunchback, who before has befriended the child, follows the artist and informs the police, who break in upon the criminals, but fail to capture the child. Marie is taken by her captor to Nice, still followed by Bosco. How he lost trace of the two and later found them make an interesting train of adventures.

The first half of the picture is laid in Paris and the last in Nice, 700 miles away. There are fine views of prominent points in both cities, of the latter especially. The grounds about the Villa Carmen, where the chief of the Apaches carries Marie, form a splendid setting, more marked, perhaps, by reason of the strong contrast with the dens of the underworld shown in the earlier parts. The backgrounds, however, do not make the story; they fortify it; the plot itself sustains the interest. One of the strongest scenes is where the captain goes to the Apaches to pay the reward for the return of Marie and to claim her. There are many other situations that make for suspense.

Scene from "In the Clutch of the Apaches" (Gaumont).

MANUFACTURING COMPANY INCORPORATED.

The Colorado Motion Picture Company, of 1444 Stuart Street, Denver, announces its incorporation under the laws of that State. The officers of the company are: C. S. Dines, president; W. E. Foley, vice-president; Tyson Dynes, Jr., secretary and treasurer, and O. B. Thayer, director.

This company is now making a three-reel feature film, featuring Tom Tynan, warden of the Colorado State Penitentiary, at Canon City, Col. A specialty will be made of military and Western feature films, all of which will have the advantage of the extraordinarily fine mountain scenery of Colorado.

WEST COAST COMPANY BUILDING STUDIO.

Word comes from Fresno, Cal., which is the headquarters of the West Coast Motion Picture Producing Company, that that concern is now building a studio that will be one of the finest and most completely equipped to be found anywhere. When the building is finished work will be commenced at once upon photoplays of the highest standard, produced and executed by men who are considered the best available for such work. These productions will consist of features and regular releases. The initial release will be one feature and one single reel per week, which will be increased as the trade demands.

COURTENAY FOOTE FILLING DATES.

Having recently terminated his connection with the Vitagraph Company, Mr. Courtenay Foote, the well-known legitimate actor and photoplayer, has been taking on dates for appearances at motion picture theaters in the larger cities. His tour is scheduled to begin about the first of November. Mr. Foote did not furnish any address, but it is quite probable that communications will reach him at the Allen Academy of Arts, Hartford, Conn. He has appeared in a number of Vitagraph's features, one of the latest of which is "Father and Son, or the Curse of the Golden Land," in which he played the lead.

LITTLE WILLIE'S ORDER.

Willie Miller, of Edinburg, Indiana, wrote to the Kleine Optical Company, stating that he was interested in theater equipment and to kindly forward a projection machine, drawing on the Union Trust Company, Edinburg, Ind., for the necessary funds. The machine went in due course and in due course, also, went a sight draft on the Union Trust Company. A week elapsed and then manager Frank Hough was stunned by the receipt of the draft returned by the bank, with a note attached saying: "William Miller unable to make payment. Stated intention was to pay on the installment plan. Party about twelve years old."

"His Hour of Triumph"

The Imp Company Produces a Fine Two-Reel Drama and a Most Amusing Single-Reel Burlesque.

By George Blaisdell.

THERE was thrown on the screen in the Universal Company's exhibition room on Friday, in the course of the ordinary showing for the Censorship Board, a two-reel picture that is bound to make a strong impression. The script is written by Walter MacNamara. It is produced by George L. Tucker. That the combination is a good one there is no doubt; if there were, the one-reel burlesque shown later in the day and played by the same company would clinch it. Here were two productions, one the opposite of the other—surely a good test of the versatility of writer, producer and players. The leads in these excellent pictures were played by William E. Shay, Jane Gail and William E. Welsh. It is interesting to note that Mr. Welsh these days is receiving recognition in the assignment of important parts—and he more than makes good.

Scene from "His Hour of Triumph" (Imp).

"His Hour of Triumph" succeeds where nearly all pictures fail—in attempting to make a play within a play. Not only does it keep steadily in the view of the observer the main action—i. e., the triumph or failure of the reporter who is fighting first for money to send away a sick wife and secondly for himself—but it makes interesting the stage production in which the reporter-playwright is making his debut. There is heart interest and there is suspense and there is pathos. Judiciously interspersed throughout the two reels there is fine comedy—just flashes of it, sufficient to relieve the tension and never enough at any time to throw the attention or the interest from the main theme.

Scene from "Jane of Moth-Eaten Farm" (Imp).

The heart interest comes when we see the distress of the reporter at home—with his sinking wife, on her face the gray look that marks the approach of the end. It is intensified when we see her holding the manuscript as her husband rehearses his part. Even stronger is the situation at the end, of the wife as it is of the story, as she passes out without learning of the triumph of her husband, who, surrounded by the members of his company and the author of the play—their former skepticism and ill-concealed jeers now forgotten in the hearty congratulations—hears over the telephone that his triumph is in vain. Those who have been watching the screen knew it before the new actor did; flashes of the sickroom have told the story. The deepest note of suspense comes at the moment when the star prepares for the opening of the play. There is every indication that his debut will be a fluke—his trembling hand as he tries to drink the bracer which the colored man brings to him seems a sure sign. When we see him enter upon the scene with the air of the trained actor the relief compensates for the strain.

The best of the comedy is in the behavior of the theater audience. There is one big man in front who during the first act scandalizes his neighbors by going to sleep. His violent applause in the second act shows his awakening. Seated near him is a face that will be recognized by many who live in or near the metropolis—that of a well-known critic. Bored at first, he indicates later his approval by a gentle tapping of the hands. The author of the play, seated in a box by himself, gives us a fine bit of character work. The stagehands also, by their deep interest in the progress of the play, furnish cause for laughter.

William E. Shay, now in Europe in the company of Herbert Brenon, gives a splendid interpretation of the reporter-playwright. Jane Gail as the leading woman, playing the part of the adventuress, maintains the reputation she has won for steady, heady work. Director Tucker says she has brains. It may be added in all truth that she has charm of manner and magnetism. William Welsh in the role of actor-manager by his fine playing adds to the illusion of the play. Among the many whose character work stands out are the author of the stage play and the young woman who interprets the sick wife. Just a word as to the staging of the picture. The atmosphere of the theater is early established and maintained throughout. The release date is October 27.

"Jane of Moth-Eaten Farm."

The Imp Company will release on October 30, a burlesque by the same author, director and players. There is a full reel given over to fun. We recall no picture made on these lines that is its superior; and that is speaking with much conservatism. It will be enjoyed in all theaters; and the ment and satisfactory service are assured.

FEATURE FILM COMPANY MOVES.

The Feature Film Company, which has been doing business for some time at 108 East 12th Street, New York City, has moved to suite 805, on the eighth floor of the Masonic Building, Sixth Avenue and 23rd Street, New York. The new quarters are much larger and more suitable for the business, which has been growing rapidly under the management of Messrs. I. Cohen and Charles Penser. Both Mr. Cohen and Mr. Penser are old hands in the motion picture business and enjoy the confidence of their patrons. Their familiarity with the feature film trade has enabled them to extend the business of the concern to a remarkable degree.

The new offices of the Feature Film Company will be fitted up in the best style; new furniture and fixtures have been installed and present an imposing appearance. The stock of features has also been strengthened by liberal purchases of the best available product in the world's market. European and American manufacturers have alike contributed their quota to the list of subjects now available for customers of the Feature Film Company.

A general invitation is extended to exhibitors seeking features to call at the new offices of the Feature Film Company and inspect its list of up-to-date subjects. Courteous treatment and satisfactory service are assured.

ROSKAM FILMING WORLD SERIES.

The Commercial Motion Pictures Company, of 102 West 101st Street, New York, announces that it has secured the official privilege of recording, in moving pictures, the World Series baseball games between the New York Giants and the Athletics of Philadelphia.

One day after the series is over complete prints, measuring approximately two thousand feet, showing every game, event and important play, will be sold to exchanges, theaters and feature film men who desire to book the completed pictures of the entire series in the thousands of vaudeville and moving picture theaters throughout the country.

It is probable that these films will be taken under the direct supervision of Mr. Edward M. Roskam, president of the company, whose long experience as a photographic expert should insure a perfect set of pictures.

Dancing Lessons Pictured

Kalem Produces a Novel Subject Illustrating the "Tango" and the "Turkey Trot"—A Three Part Feature.

EDUCATIONAL enthusiasts, more especially those savants who are concerned about the proper instruction of the art terpsichorean, will find much to interest in the approaching Kalem picture, "Motion Picture Dancing Lessons." From a technical point of view it is one of the best the Kalem company has issued in some time. Good photography and settings are noticeable and praiseworthy. The subject is one that cannot fail to be of interest, especially since there has been so much written concerning the dances that are featured in the picture, namely, the "Tango" and the "Turkey Trot."

Scene from "Motion Picture Dancing Lessons" (Kalem).

Professor Wallace McCutcheon, not unknown to the motion picture art, who has been passing his summer dancing tangos and trots with Ziegfeld's Follies in company with a very charming dancing partner, Miss Joan Sawyer, is the instructor in the Kalem picture. His first lesson is in the new Viennese Hesitation Waltz. Assisted by Prof. Walter Simon at the piano, Prof. McCutcheon puts his pupils through the initiatory steps in his studio, or "Ecole du Danse." At first the full figures of the professor and student is shown, then close up views of the professor's feet giving the steps for the man, and then the women are shown. Finally what purports to be a typical roof garden scene with orchestra, guests and waiters, is given and here the finished product is shown and it is some graceful dance. Following this is dancing by all the roof garden votaries—a very pretty scene.

Professor McCutcheon successively conducts his pupils through the "Turkey Trot," the "Tango" and its several variations, proving those much denounced dances to be quite decorous. It is just possible that Professor McCutcheon has taken some of the "tang" out of the "Tango" in giving his exhibition, but it goes to prove that it is not the dance, but the dancer, who is to blame for any odium that may attach to these newest variations of the "light fantastic."

"Motion Picture Dancing Lessons" is in three parts and is none too long for a subject of the kind. Suitable music is suggested for the dances.

S. S. HUTCHINSON RETURNS TO CHICAGO.

On Saturday morning, September 27th, Mr. S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Manufacturing Company, returned to Chicago from an extended stay at Santa Barbara, Cal.

Mr. Hutchinson states that the new plant and equipment is progressing in a most satisfactory manner. The property holdings have been practically doubled and the construction of the buildings, with other improvements to be made on the property, will entail an expenditure close to $100,000.

The construction of the buildings and the laying out of the grounds has all been done under the personal supervision of Mr. Hutchinson and every consideration given to a combination of practicability and artistic beauty. Ample facilities have been provided to insure a consistent variety of productions and the forthcoming releases of "Flying A" subjects will substantiate all claims in this respect.

After a short stay at Chicago and a trip to New York, Mr. Hutchinson will return to California for another protracted

Multiple-Reel Broncho.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THIS story is chiefly remarkable for the acting of a girl I have not been called upon to notice before, Miss Dorothy Davenport, of unusual type and very attractive personality. She holds attention every moment she is in action and interest fades when dramatic requirements remove her from it. That she is ably supported by Messrs. Stanton and Chatterton helps matters, but all eyes will center on her up to the moment of her tragic death and vainly wander thereafter in search of compensation. The acting and the costumes and the settings are all good, but the play is too much on hackneyed lines and too lacking in humanity as we know it to be classed with others from the same company.

There is a shipwreck scene of good intentions and bad performance—the sailing vessel in a storm is shown as dipping on deck and as rolling like a steamer in the cabin—and there is a more consistent view of survivors on a raft. All this is to throw the last survivor, the dashing son of an English Lord, on a wild coast, supposedly that of Ireland, that he may fall in love with Kathleen and ruin her under promise of marriage. That she is already betrothed to honest young Dan Conner is in full accord with the moth-eaten Irish drama taken down from the shelf at regular intervals and brushed up for a reappearance.

Aside from the varying, fascinating and altogether delightful character revelations of Mistress Dorothy, there are a few—all too few—exquisite scenic effects, those of sunset in the early reels and in the final one. These deserve high praise. All people love that beauty and all love what young Miss Davenport has scant opportunity to show, interesting revelations of human nature. Such tales are almost naif in their bare narrative of incident with only a touch of what puts red blood into fiction. The essential art that is so lacking in such pictures is that which catches human nature in its moments of self revelation, catches it in the act of disclosing itself, surprises the secrets of character, bares its hidden springs, yet so delicately that the richness, breadth and intensity of character seems perfectly natural. There is no need of stretching and straining for high tension when flashes of insight into personality and motive light up a dull play, and without it the best play becomes a hollow disappointment.

The idea of bringing in an English Lord as the heavy to put an honest Irish country boy in the limelight might have been all right in the days of uncombed Bowery audiences, when a smooth-faced Harp with glassy eyes fixed on the gallery sung out of the corner of his mouth that Ireland was Ireland when England was a pup, but such stuff disappeared long ago in the melting pot. We are splashing around in a lot of situations and problems of our own today and entirely too much engaged in the development of native character and drama to care a snap for what does not sound a note in harmony with thoughts and purposes of the hour.

The wrong done Kathleen is still done, but it could be depicted with far greater force if brought home to American hearts by a presentation of unjust conditions under which our girls are compelled to battle for decency in their lives and for the natural purposes of their sex endowment amid cruel oppressions of commercialism. We need not go so far afield for such a story.

EDISON COMEDY EVERY MONDAY.

Every Monday will find a new Edison comedy release, as that company has decided to make a comedy release regularly on that day. Heretofore Edison has been putting out comedies on any day in the week but it is deemed advisable, in view of the great popularity of the comedies, to fix a certain day upon which to release them.

The comedies already listed on the Monday schedule are: "A Short Life and a Merry One," "Bill's Career as Butler," "Hiram Green, Detective" and "The Hornet's Nest." They form a chain of rattling good fun makers and there are promised many more, featuring such well known comedy players as Alice Washburn, William Wadsworth, Edward O'Connor, Herbert Prior, Arthur Housman and Dan Mason.

CHICAGO LETTER

By JAS. S. McQUADE

THE "gun play" in moving pictures has been taken up in Chicago by the judiciary, police authorities and reform officials. Even the suggestion of firearms has been condemned.

Major M. L. C. Funkhouser, second deputy superintendent of police, indorses the movement. He says his hands are full trying to live up to his principles of forbidding all plays exploiting crime, showing degradation of women, making a hero of a criminal, or ridiculing constituted authority.

Jeremiah J. O'Connor, of the Chicago censor board, is not impressed by the evil of shooting off pistols in a photoplay. "When no one is killed, there is no more harm in looking at a man shooting a pistol than to witness a display of military tactics, or soldiers marching fully equipped," said the sergeant.

But Judge M. W. Pinckney, who was present at the conference, believes otherwise. "There is no parallel in the cases," said the judge. "The soldiers defend the country and as such should be revered. In the plays a man draws a pistol because he is in a temper. The thought of a pistol is bad for a boy."

"I have already complained of the 'gun practice' in pictures," said Chief Justice Harry Olson of the Municipal Court. "One might as well have public executions in the jails as to have hangings on films."

"Children need no instruction in murders, quarrels, and the dragging of women through the patrol wagons. These things should not enter into a child's ideals at all," said Judge Mary Bartelme.

"I have shed tears from nervousness after seeing so much revolver practice in the pictures," said Miss Kate Adams. "There must be 50 per cent. of the pictures at least which feature rifles or revolvers. Parents who protect their children from associating with criminals do not appear to mind their spending many hours in the week with those criminals in the pictures. The influence is just as bad for a child's imagination as the real thing."

Counter to this preponderance of opinion against the use of firearms in moving pictures, a contributor to the editorial columns of the Chicago News, who signs herself "A Woman Citizen," gives us the following from a woman's wisdom:

"As a worker among children I should strongly protest against the exhibition of demoralizing or crime producing moving pictures to old or young, but surely some of our good citizens are drawing dangerously near to the borderline of sentimental prudishness.

"From the dawn of literature, tragedy, death, crime and wrongdoing have furnished plots for countless noble plays, poems and stories. Why not keep the young away from Shakespeare, the Bible, nearly all history, because murders and other crimes are therein portrayed? Why allow any drama or novel containing a robbery or a murder to be performed or published? Let us take Sherlock Holmes from the shelves of the library. Away with 'Hamlet,' 'Oliver Twist,' 'The Virginian.' Let us all read the 'Rollo' books! Are the motion pictures never to relate a historical, detective or tragedy story—never to dramatize the greatest literary masterpieces?

"It is not the plot of a film, but the treatment thereof that determines the influence of the picture. One of the most beautiful pictures recently shown contains a stabbing scene, but surely every fair minded person must recognize the noble quality of the 'Ghost of Granleigh.' How is the right to triumph over wrong without the wrong? Children's minds are not so weak as some people would have us believe, and nothing repels them so much as 'can't' and 'goody-goody' or stories.

"Also our friends forget that children are not the only patrons of moving pictures. 'Milk for babies' is not the only thing to be desired. The marvelous appeal of these pictures lies in their depiction of all sorts of people, in all sorts of places and circumstances, and their field should not be needlessly narrowed or weakened. Such sweeping general rules as the elimination of firearms can only do great harm. The sight of a revolver in a film will do a boy no more harm than the use of military tactics as a boy scout. Let each film be judged on its own merits, and not by absurd rules.

"All honor to the board of censors for their wisdom and broadmindedness so far. Let them eliminate indecency and brutality with all zeal; let them prohibit all pictures making heroes of criminals or showing cruelty to animals or little children. But for the sake of thousands of enthusiastic lovers of the picture drama, let them not, through overnicety, reduce our films to a state of milk and water debility. Let us see a few villains and have a few thrills. We shall survive them."

Good Housewives Praying for Pictures.

There is still trouble in the home life of the housewives of Wilmette, all because they fear a general strike of their house maids whose entertainment by moving pictures has not yet been provided for, although many months have passed since the question was first agitated.

It appears that the trouble does not lie in an adverse ordinance, so much as in the rivalry existing between the owners of a theater in Evanston—who were unsuccessful in securing permission to erect a theater in Wilmette—and certain residents of Wilmette who have combined to build a theater in their own burg. The site the latter have selected, unfortunately, lies in too close proximity to a church, and by so doing infringes on the ordinance.

Meanwhile, the good housewives of the pretty suburban spot are praying that moving pictures may come before the long nights of winter set in, so that Wilmette may escape being branded as too slow a town by their help, who have threatened to migrate to "moving" climes.

Historical Value of Buffalo Bill Series.

The Buffalo Bill series of moving pictures by Essanay promises to be unusually complete and possessed of valuable historical interest. Lieut. Gen. Nelson A. Miles, retired; Brig. Gen. Charles King, soldier and author, and several other distinguished soldiers of the Indian wars passed through Chicago on their way to the Pine Ridge Indian Agency, near Rushville, Neb., September 30, where they will join the Buffalo Bill forces.

Gen. Miles and his companions were persuaded to take part in the drama by the approval of Secretary Garrison, of the War Department, and Secretary of the Interior Lane. The object is to perpetuate in moving pictures some of the scenes of the Custer campaign, with the principal roles taken by men who actually figured in the fights of that period.

Gen. Miles' principal activities in the Indian wars were as leader of the expeditions against Geronimo and Natchez. Gen. King figured in the wars as captain of artillery and cavalry. Equally interesting was the work of Brig. Gen. Frank D. Baldwin, brevetted major for gallantry in his attack on the camp of Sitting Bull on Red Water River, Mont., and also recipient of two medals of honor.

Others with the party were Major Gen. Charles F. Humphrey and Brig. Gen. Marion P. Maus. The latter graduated from West Point at the outbreak of the serious Indian troubles and saw many years of service in the numerous campaigns down to the Sioux campaign of 1890, on the exact spot where he is now to appear before the camera.

Earlier he had fought the Nez Perces and Sioux and Apaches all the way from Montana to Mexico. Then he served through the Spanish War and returned to fighting Indians of a little different color in the Philippines. Gen. Humphrey, who won his medal for Indian service in Idaho, was retired only six years ago after forty years of service.

The assortment of Indians will be picked from the reservation, and a liberal detachment of regulars will be assigned by the War Department. The Department attaches considerable importance to the probable historical value of the pictures to be made, on which it is asserted $100,000 will be expended.

V. R. Day, manager of Essanay, left a few days earlier for the agency, a sixty foot baggage car being used to carry carbines, soldiers' uniforms of the period in which the Buffalo Bill scenes arelaid, Hotchkess guns, equipment, provisions, etc.

Selig Director Imprisoned in Film.

At the recent International Refrigerating Congress, held in Chicago, the formal proceedings were happily varied by a visit to the Selig Polyscope Company's studio and plant. Director Oscar Eagle, at the time engaged in producing an exterior scene of "The Circular Staircase," a feature detective subject, devised a fire scene in the yard. This turned out to be more realistic than he had intended, as the fire consumed not only the building selected, but also the staircase in the photoplay itself, a piece of work highly prized by the boss carpenter and his corps of skillful joiners.

A passer-by pulled a fire alarm, thinking the big plant on fire, and the neighboring fire companies made a record run to the spot. The quick-gathering crowd, in the excitement and struggle to gain vantage points, mixed with the two hundred or more guests, and Palmer Brown, Mr. Eagle's assistant, could not resist taking a moving picture of the realistic scene.

At the time, the visitors did not know that they were being imprisoned in the film. Indeed, the whole scene was quite accidental, and nobody was more surprised than Director Eagle to find that he himself was being pictured as directing the fire fighters and warning the crowd to stand back.

William Lee, Deceased.

William Lee, at one time on the staff of the American's Eastern company and for many years an actor of standing in the dramatic field and well known to many traveling and stock companies, died in Chicago, Monday, September 22nd. Mr. Lee's talented characterization of Jim Starbuck, the Tennessee mountain preacher in "The Starbucks," received commendation from all who viewed that fine American subject. The funeral was held at Lane's Chapel, 63rd Street, on Thursday, September 25th, and interment was made in Mount Hope Cemetery, this city. Mr. Lee's death was caused by heart failure. He was about 50 years old. He leaves a wife and daughter in this city to mourn his loss.

Among Chicago Exhibitors.

Health Commissioner Young, of Chicago, in his campaign against ill-ventilated theaters, decided to issue a certificate to every house that installed the ventilation system recommended by the ordinance. The first theater ventilation certificate issued was given to Dirk Kemp, proprietor of a moving picture theater at 2122 West Chicago Avenue. Kemp told Dr. Young that he had been asked to subscribe $25 to the fund being collected by the moving picture exhibitors to fight the ventilation ordinance, and that he had refused.

On Saturday, October 4th, the Washington Theater, 39th Street and Cottage Grove Avenue, owned by C. C. Whelan, was closed by the health department on the charge of poor ventilation. It is known that the Washington is considered a well ventilated theater, there never having been any complaint among its patrons to the contrary. It is understood that a test case will be made of the charge against the Washington. Mr. Whelan has the full backing of the association and the result will be awaited with interest.

The adoption of the rule, three reels for five cents and five reels for 10 cents, it would appear, has fallen flat. The minority—and I may say a very small minority—called in counsel to assist them against coercion. On September 22nd, a registered letter was sent out to every officer of the association and to every film exchange by Adolph D. Weiner, attorney for the minority.

One paragraph of this letter reads: "I beg to call your attention to the Illinois Statutes, Chapter 38, Section 99, which reads: 'Any combination to regulate or fix the price of any article or to limit the amount produced or sold is declared a conspiracy to defraud, and subjects the offender to indictment and punishment.'"

The attorney also threatens that if the practices complained of are continued, "the facts will immediately be submitted to the Federal and District Attorney and to the State's attorney, reserving the right to seek damages individually from the guilty corporation, its officers and members."

A mass meeting of exhibitors will attend a special council meeting at the City Hall, Friday, October 10th.

Chicago Film Brevities.

The following cablegram from George Kleine, Paris, October 2nd, was received in the Chicago office: "Hippodrome, Paris, has five thousand seats. All sold last night; no standing room left after running one week photodrama Pompeii. Prices one dollar fifty down. Gaumont paid twenty thousand francs for one week's rental with Paris priority. Also great success in Italy." This is the great photodrama in six reels by Ambrosio, the world rights for which have been secured by George Kleine and his associates.

Wm. N. Selig arrived in New York from Europe, after a two months' absence, Wednesday, October 8th.

John C. Pelzer, formerly head of the Edison Kinetoscope and supply department and now assistant manager of the exclusive department of the General Film Company, was in the city Saturday, October 4th.

E. M. Porter, Pittsburg representative of the Famous Players' Film Service, made a recent call at the World office, while passing through the city.

I. Lesser Cohen, proprietor of the Globe Theater, Portland, Ore., accompanied by his son, paid a call at the World office, while stopping over in this city, on his way to New York.

J. H. Redder, owner of the Francisco Theater, 2917 Madison Street, paid a visit to the World last week. Mr. Redder states that his house is equipped with the latest ventilating system and that business is excellent. Mutual programs are used at this house, which seats 500 people, the admission charge being five cents. Mr. Redder subscribed for the World.

H. W. Griggs, of Milwaukee, called at the World office recently. He is contemplating the handling of educational films on a circuit out of the Cream City, in nearby towns. Mr. Griggs gives his presentations in churches on week days. It is his intention to carry a vocal quartet on the country circuit.

Two "baby" giraffes, each nine feet tall, arrived in the city Sunday night from the far Soudan. They were shipped out West to Selig's zoo in Edendale, Los Angeles, Monday, October 6th. The pets, which are about eleven months old, cost $10,000. They were accompanied to Chicago by two other "babies" intended for the Lincoln Park zoo.

Charles W. Cook, owner of the Bijou Theater, Indianapolis, the first theater built in that city, dropped in to say "Howdy?" the other day. The Bijou is doing excellent business, Mr. Cook said. He also paid a high compliment to the Moving Picture World and said that he could not get along without it.

M. Jesselson, of Jesselson & Israel, owners of the Halsted Theater, Halsted and Van Buren Streets, now under construction, paid a visit to the World office last week. The Halsted will seat about 775 people and will be opened in about a month. Picture programs from the General Film Company will be used. The admission will be five cents.

* * *

O. W. Frederick, whom I saw at the Illinois convention in Peoria, is building a new theater in Pekin, Ill., which he expects will be finished in time for Thanksgiving opening. This theater, the old Standard of Pekin, will be all new except the walls when completed. It will seat 600 people and the cost of remodeling and re-equipment, etc., will be $24,000. O. W. Frederick is one of the members of the grievance committee formed at the Peoria convention.

The Howell Sales Company, with offices and salesroom in suite 746 First National Bank Building, has just been organized to promote the interests of the Simplex projector in Chicago and adjacent territory. F. Wilbur Howell and Arthur E. Johnson are the officials of the company. Both have been associated for several years with the well known Bell & Howell Company, this city, in important capacities. They are both well equipped young men, and thoroughly familiar with their chosen field and with its trade conditions. Their advertisement appears elsewhere in this issue.

Two ladies, owners of moving picture theaters, were the only representatives of the fair sex at the recent Peoria convention. They were Mrs. Musa Reese, of the Aereo Theater, Charleston, Ill., and Mrs. E. J. Striewing, of the Crystal Theater, Decatur, Ill. The manager of the Aereo is John Corcoran, who also attended the convention. Mrs. Reese is an ardent admirer of moving pictures and she has been very successful. The Aereo, which seats 300 people, is always full and well selected programs are offered at all times. Mrs. Striewing was forced to take over the management of the Crystal owing to the illness of her husband, who is now a confirmed invalid. Since January last, she has had all the responsibilities of management on her own shoulders, and it is pleasant to learn that she has been rewarded with business that is steady and profitable. The Crystal seats 415 people.

WORLD SPECIAL FILMS CORP. ENLARGING.

The original headquarters of the World Special Films Corporation at 110 West 40th Street, New York have been found too small for the needs of the company. It has now taken the suite of offices in the rear of its present quarters, which gives one-half of the 9th floor of the Worlds Tower Bldg. A projecting room is being fitted up which will be one of the finest in New York.

Mr. E. A. Fenton, formerly of the Kinetograph Company, was engaged Saturday as manager of the Canadian offices, with branches in Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg. These offices will be open within the next ten days or two weeks.

Mr. B. H. Brient, recent manager for the "Mutual" in Indianapolis, has been engaged to take charge of the new offices in the Willoughby Building this week.

Mr. C. B. Case, of Syracuse, will look after the business of the corporation in that city.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

A RECENTLY published letter signed by some so-called "moving picture extra actors," complaining of mistreatment by agents has brought the subject of "extras" quite prominently before public notice, although the attention attracted is not of the kind the writers of the letter anticipated. The wail of the complainants was that agents induced them to run to the offices several times a day and several days in succession before giving them employment, and that when they do get work the unfortunates do not receive enough to pay a day's board. Crowding upon this, and with no defined reason, the writers of the letter ask "who looks after the sanitary conditions of the moving picture studio?" and "who looks after the agents who sometimes get away with our salary?" And, again, they yell, "the city officials should look into this matter."

In a subsequent publication, the manager of a "super" agency took the opportunity by the forelock to get some free advertising by stating in an interview that the "supers" he engages for motion picture concerns get from $2.50 to $5 per day and that the "super" of today stands far above what he was in the old days of stage work with respect to the opportunities for money making.

So far as the complaining letter is concerned, it merits no more attention than that required to set the facts before the public, and the agency manager's interview carries about the same weight with it. Both mislead the public and both place in a very unpleasant light many very respectable and talented people who are really "moving picture extra actors."

* * *

The extra people employed in the production of motion pictures may be divided into classes, namely: Extra actors, "supers," extra people and—yes, the rabble is a good name for the fourth class; a class that was evidently responsible for the complaining letter. Extra actors are those who are called upon to play parts when the producing companies have not sufficient good people in their regular stock, or are known to be peculiarly adapted to the effective rendition of certain characters. They are professional people who justly take pride in their profession and whose ability lends valuable color to the studio work. Many of them have had brilliant stage careers; others are making them. Hundreds that appear in motion pictures during the late spring and through the summer seasons appear in the best stage productions at big salaries during the rest of the year. They are not "extras" as the term is applied in the recent publications. Their position is relatively the same as that of "extras" before the motion pictures took the field. When a theatrical company required enlargement, members became incapacitated, or some other emergency arose, the managers drew upon the theatrical agencies.

"Supers" is a term very much disliked by all the other classes of so-called extras, yet it is a distinguishing title. It may be said to class them above the other extras mentioned. To be a good "super" one should have ability as an actor and knowledge of stagecraft. In the old days he simply carried a gun or spear and little attention was paid to him unless some blunder evoked derision from the gallery. In the motion picture business it frequently happens the intelligence of a "super" will save heavy loss. The old time "super" rarely had the opportunity to advance that the modern one has.

Then come what are known as "extra people," and there are so many of them. They figure in the backgrounds of ball room and garden party scenes. All they have to do is to look nice and keep off the toes of their neighbors. They are automatons, and if they dare make an attempt to act the director reaches for a repeating rifle. The harvest of "extra people" comes mainly from the households. Some go into the scenes for the novelty of the thing. Others cherish the hope that they may some night have the unbounded pleasure of pointing to their picture on the screen for the benefit of their friends. Not a few seek to increase the income for the family's support. Many become automatons with the hope that it may be the stepping into an artistic career. Few live to realize this.

Next comes the rabble, the crowds that swarm into the fray, fill the seats at the races, or yell "Back to the mine, boys." It is this class that has rushed into print with nonsensical complaints. They balk on paying agents commissions for securing them jobs and cry out against sanitary conditions, if any objectionable exist, that they create themselves. It is the fact that mob scenes are sometimes important factors in productions that make these people feel they are important and indispensable. It has emboldened then to audacity and they cry out "Now, our brothers, the professional actors, have a White Rat Union that helps them out." In the good old days managers got as effective scenes by throwing open the stage doors and allowing the crowds to rush upon the stages from the streets. And it did not cost a penny to get the mobs. The privilege of getting upon a stage before a real, live audience was sufficient recompense. The services rendered today by the rabble are no more valuable than they were in the good old times when even the "supers" got only fifty cents a performance, and sometimes less. The reason the rabble now receives three times and more than that amount is the remote location of some studios from localities where the rabble can be secured.

The last species of "extras" can elicit little sympathy on the part of the public by such complaints as have thus far been made. There are many reasons for this. The majority of the people who force their presence at the various studios for almost a week and derive less than will pay a day's board brand themselves as being of an undesirable type. There are deserving people who hang on in the hope that conditions will improve, but there is a limit to their patience or endurance and they seek other means of livelihood. The habitual hanger-on hates the shadow of a shovel or pick, and it is no secret that he frequently becomes a crook. A contractor recently sought to hire a number of men who were hanging about the outskirts of a studio, but met with few responsible, although he offered the current rate of laborer's wages. Men having trades and an opportunity to follow them have been known to sit idle, waiting for a picture. This is a condition that is gradually becoming known to the public and accounts for its apathy when the so-called extras attempt to ventilate their troubles. An officer of a large motion picture producing company declared the so-called extra an expensive and abominable nuisance. "These people," he said, "feel that we should arrange our productions with the one idea of giving employment to them. Our expenses are of minor importance to them. If all the studios in the country tried to comply with the wishes of these people the supply would still exceed the demand and I consider it almost criminal for any publication to exaggerate the extra people subject as opportunities, the requirements and the money to be earned. The day after one of the recent publications was made we were deluged by applicants who had been led to believe that the studios were in desperation over the lack of such help. In less than two hours I can get together as large a mob as any studio can handle, and without the aid of any agency. A deplorable feature of the affair is the misguiding of so many respectable people by statements of avaricious agents and newspaper writers. It is a playing upon the credulty of the people that should stop."

EDISON ISSUES MUSIC CUES.

The Edison Company is now issuing music cues for all Edison films. They are being prepared by a well known orchestra leader, who has had years of experience in vaudeville and motion picture houses, and are being printed in the Kinetogram, the Edison house publication.

Contrary to the usual methods employed, a specific piece is rarely referred to in music cues, the writer describing simply the kind of music that is best suited to the action. This was done because of the fact that many of the pieces called for by name in music cues are totally unfamiliar to a large number of pianists and, if they do not happen to know the particular piece mentioned, the cue is worthless. The Edison plan leaves the actual selection of the piece to the pianist, suggesting only its character. Essential sound effects will also be indicated. These music cues will undoubtedly simplify the pianist's work a great deal where Edison films are concerned, and are sure to prove popular among the player folks.

The Ecclesiastical Standing of Moving Pictures.

THE moving picture, or more correctly speaking Kinematography, in all its best parts is now practically accepted by all leaders of religious thought and teaching as a necessary and in many instances a more than necessary aid to religious work, besides being a powerful auxiliary to all kinds of social and secular activities in the broad field of religious influences.

At a recent meeting of one of the New York Ministerial Associations the Rev. W. H. Jackson, who is well known to the readers of the Moving Picture Educator as a regular contributor to its pages, read a paper on "The Kinematograph and the Church." Not only was the paper well received and favorably discussed, but the standing of the moving picture was admitted as especially adapted to all kinds of ecclesiastical and socio-religious work. This marks a distinct advance which the moving picture has won for itself by proof of its own inherent values.

Demonstrating Its Usefulness in Churches.

Under this title The Congregationalist and Christian World, of Boston, which is perhaps the leading religious publication in New England, publishes in a recent issue a two page article by the Rev. Edwin W. Bishop, D. D. After describing "what moving pictures are" in a way familiar to our own readers, he proceeds to show in the following language the extensiveness of the production of films and the still wider range of their uses by the multitudes of the people of all lands:

> A new phenomenon is at present sweeping over the popular heavens. Ten years ago it was hardly larger than a man's hand. It has now reached gigantic proportions. It began as a simple amusement. It has now completely overspread the amusement heavens, has become a phenomenon of no mean importance in the educational firmament, and is now invading that portion of the sky commonly conceded to religion. What is this phenomenon which began as sensational and often wanton amusement for the idle hour, and has gradually purified and lifted itself into the educational realm, and has in itself even the potencies for religious inspiration? What is this new form of recreation which has captured the working people, closed up the penny arcades, hit vaudeville a hard blow and decimated the middle class theaters to such an extent that many have already succumbed? What is this new economic and financial entity which, beginning with nothing, is now estimating its output and its intake in millions? It is the Moving Picture?

Moving Picture Patronage.

Dealing with the question of the popular favor the moving picture has secured especially among children the article quoted further says:

> The motion picture outclasses the public library in the extent of patronage and rivals the daily paper in popularity. For weal or woe the impressionable classes of the nation are coming under its influence. What does this pretend? Shall this mighty potential force be looked upon with scorn, or—treated with indifference, or utilized for righteousness?

Psychology of Motion Pictures.

> The psychology of the motion picture is not far to seek. Commonest of all appeals is the appeal to the eye. Eighty per cent. of the furnishings of our sensorium enters through the eye-gate. Then, too, motion is universally more compelling than still life. A moving object at once excites the attention of either the kitten or the baby. Couple these two facts with another, namely, that the love for drama seems to be instinctive in human nature, and you have in the motion picture a trinity of appeal that is well-nigh irresistible.

Sociology of Motion Pictures.

No less apparent is the sociology of the moving pictures. Its democracy and its appeal to the family group have always been apparent. How it replaces the saloon by substitution is even more to the point. In Washington, D. C., 513 saloon licenses had been issued before November 13, 1911; on the same date in 1912 the number of licenses had been reduced by two-thirds. Many of the saloon keepers cited the development of the moving picture business as the reason. In Pottsville, Penn., about one hundred saloons flourishing in 1911 were put out of business in 1912. Here again the saloon keepers laid the charge at the motion picture door. "The Expulsive Power of a New Affection," as preached by Jesus, shows this principle is at the bottom of the sanest warfare work of the age. Can it be that an ally of the sober life is right at our hands?

The Educational and Religious Pictures.

Concerning these pictures Dr. Bishop says much that our readers are already familiar with, especially when referring to films of living organisms and industrial pursuits. He is especially correct and worthy of quoting when he says:

> Any one who has seen a picture of the life cycle of the house fly, or of the production of a finished bookcase from the log in the forest to the finished article, thrown boldly and graphically upon the screen will never speak slightingly of the educational value of the motion picture.
> In the religious world, if the religious world could but see it, the motion picture is beckoning and saying, Come over into Macedonia and help us. The help given would be mutual. Through its appeal to the eye and its power of exciting and sustaining interest, the motion picture can easily become a splendid ally of the church. Through its adoption as a part of the equipment of the church the motion picture can be lifted to a higher level, not only in public estimation, but also in the character of the films presented. As the National Board of Censorship observes: If moving pictures became extensively used in churches, schools and social centers, a new motion picture audience would be created and a new standard of taste would quickly ensue. This would react on the average quality of motion pictures in such a manner as to make censorship increasingly unnecessary.

Some Practical Results Worth Recording.

> Park Church, Grand Rapids, Mich., has been unsuccessfully facing the downtown problem in respect to a second service for some years. At this service the morning congregation was minus. Various expedients had been tried, such as special musical services, which were very taking fifteen years ago. But within a decade, times have changed. Motion pictures have carried the popular appeal from the ear to the eye. Faintly sensing this and earnestly desirous that our commodious church plant should have a larger use on Sunday than it was having, the church fathers somewhat reluctantly consented to the installation of a new method. A motion picture machine of the latest pattern was purchased and set up. Sunday afternoon at 4.30 was the time chosen. The enterprise was called Pleasant Sunday Afternoon. It was duly advertised. The first afternoon there were 500. In three Sundays there were 1,000, which is about all the church can comfortably accommodate. For thirteen Sundays the enterprise continued, or until the daylight caused our adjournment until fall.
> The most noticeable result was the large attendance, and this of people who had never before been within the walls of the church. Several times people were turned away. Whole families came together. The presence of children was strikingly apparent. And it was interesting to observe that whenever some other feature, such as a cantata or a stereopticon lecture, was tried, the attendance was diminished. The people wanted motion pictures, and clearly showed it. In the crowds was a fair sprinkling of church people, but the majority of attendants were unattached, as the following referendum showed.

A Practical Referendum.

> One afternoon when 1,100 people were present, an expression of opinion was elicited from 445 of them by means of a printed ballot. As to method of conducting the service, 299 voted for motion pictures, 80 for the stereopticon, 75 for music, and 37 for an address. As to subjects, 208 voted for Biblical, 131 for general, 78 for patriotic, 37 for industrial, and 27 for sociological topics. Pilgrim's Progress was given an overwhelming vote as the best subject of the winter. This was given twice. As to church membership, 343 indicated that they were church members, with Congregationalists leading the list and Methodists next, down through a dozen denominations. It is fair to assume that the 757 not voting at all were largely non-church members if not non-churchgoers. The offering on this particular day was $17.98, in which there were 4 quarters, 56 dimes, 189 nickels, and 103 pennies. Forty per cent. of the audience therefore contributed something.

A Good Program.

> Our meeting was invariably opened with the singing of America and the repeating of the Lord's Prayer. Announcements were then made, a musical selection rendered by the church choir, and the offering usually taken. Then the pastor, if he were not to follow the motion picture with running comments, gave a short preliminary talk concerning it, or comment upon the general subject. Hymns thrown upon the screen either before the reel or between the reels, if there were several, were heartily sung by the congregation. The subjects chosen were as far as possible Biblical, supplemented by sociological and industrial and educational films. There is some trouble in getting just what one would desire, but with a growing demand this deficiency will be corrected.
> It would be impossible to estimate spiritual impressions, since the data are not at hand. But the report given me of a little fellow who sat next to one of the members of the choir is not without significance. As Christian, in Pilgrim's Progress, entered the heavenly city, he exclaimed with tears running down his cheeks, "Gee, I wish I could be a Christian."

The Logical Conclusion.

Asking the broad question "How shall we address ourselves to this new agency?" Dr. Bishop says:

> Shall we bury our heads in the sand like the ostrich who will not see, or shall we seize upon this which is at our very doors and re-consecrate it in the name of Christ for the benefit of humanity? Our problem to-day and looking into the future is to master the social force as our fathers mastered the physical forces. We cannot accomplish this by merely trying to hold down the lid

This well written article presented here in its best analysis is about the most appropriate reference to moving pictures which has appeared in any religious paper. It is a pleasure to reproduce much of it as at least showing the trend of the times, besides qualifying the opinions and truths so often expressed on the pages of The Educator. In a coming issue a review of Dr. Bishop's views by the editor of the paper in which they were expressed will be given.

EMPIRE THEATRE, SEATTLE-

By F. H. Richardson.

During my visit to Seattle, very naturally I was called upon to inspect many of the theaters of that city. Seattle is blessed with a number of very beautiful theaters devoted either in whole or part to the silent drama.

There is one house, however, to which especial attention must be given namely, the Clemer Theater, on Second Avenue, near Pike Street, managed by James C. Clemmer. In all my journeyings I have yet to find a moving picture theater as thoroughly complete in its appointments and as charming and completely delightful in its decorations as is this magnificent house.

The foyer is perhaps twelve feet in depth by sixty feet in width, with an arched ceiling. Its decorations are in white, gray and gold, with carpeting and draperies of old gold. It is lighted by two large, indirect lighting fixtures, with an opalescent center which throws a diffused light directly downward, in addition to the reflection from the ceiling. This makes a complete and pleasing distribution of light.

The women's waitingroom is situated on a level with the front of the balcony, one short flight up from the foyer. This room, as a whole, can only be adequately described by such adjectives as "charming" and "delightful." In all my experience I have seen nothing to compare with it. To begin with, it is carpeted with a rich velvet carpet of Alice blue. The walls, the woodwork, and the furniture, aside from the wicker work, are finished in old ivory tints. To sum it up, it can be called a feminine paradise, and many of the women would as lief pay their admission for the pleasure of spending an afternoon in this room as they would to see the show. And that's not slamming the show either.

The main floor of the theater seats 600; and the balcony, which has a rise of 14 feet in about 60 feet, seats 600.

In the front of the balcony, at either side but back some fifty feet from the curtain, are two boxes, each seating eleven people in high-backed, wicker chairs. The front five rows of the balcony are separated from the rear by a brass railing, and these seats sell for twenty-five cents; the remainder of the balcony sells for ten cents.

At the foot of the balcony, at the center, is a large box containing several high-backed, wicker chairs; but at the rear of the main floor are several boxes containing wicker chairs. Seats in these boxes sell for twenty-five cents as against ten cents for the remainder of the floor; and the manager assured me that the box seats are in high demand. I noticed, incidentally, that the Seattle audience is wise. When the house is only partly filled, the rear seats of the main auditorium are all taken and the front seats will be entirely empty, though the front row of seats is fully thirty feet from the curtain.

The house is equipped with a piano and a magnificent pipe organ, built by the Estey Organ Company, costing $10,000. This organ is really out of the ordinary, and is in charge of Oliver G. Wallace.

In the front of the auditorium, extending about thirty feet back from the proscenium, is a huge, fan-shaped arch, in the sides of which are set the organ pipes—about fifty in number— a bank of pipes being on either side of the arch. The screen sets back some eight feet from the proscenium, and is approximately sixteen feet wide. The decorations are in gray, white and gold; the walls are paneled by pilasters, the panel decorations being in soft, scenic paintings, in harmonizing shades.

The ceiling of this house is unique. Back of the front arch, before mentioned, the ceiling is square; at the sides and ends are panels, probably eight feet in width. This leaves a center piece probably fifty feet in width by eighty long (I am guessing distances), which is occupied by a huge oval, the back end of which is blocked by the wall of the operating room.

In the small panels before mentioned are twenty-eight insets, probably a foot deep, bell-shaped, and painted white inside. These insets contain frosted lights, which remain lighted during the performance. The entire oval is of steel construction, its rim extending something like a foot beyond the edge of its sides, and around the top of this rim, set back just inside of the oval, are incandescent lights about two feet apart; these lights are switched on when the picture is off, thus giving a brilliant, indirect lighting effect. Around the walls by the pilasters, above and below, are a total of thirty-two electric torches containing lights inside of pale blue and amber opalescent torch-flame glasses. These lights also burn during the performance; the result being that while the projection is not injured, I could plainly distinguish the features of persons fifty feet away while the picture was running.

The aisles are covered with a velvet carpet. The screen is surrounded by a border of black. At either side of the proscenium sit huge brass pots filled with potted plants. As has been said, the curtain is back, probably, eight feet from the proscenium, and at the side, back about twelve inches from the proscenium opening, extending from the wall to the curtain, are draperies of heavy old gold velvet, with a wide fringe at the bottom, and at the top the same material is festooned in loops.

During intermission, or when a singer is on, a magnificent old gold velvet curtain is dropped in front of the screen, the same being in pleated effect, the pleats being about two feet in width, and at the bottom of the screen is a magnificent fringe of lighter shade, probably two feet deep.

I cannot spare space to describe the ventilation system in this house, but may say it is very complete indeed. The air is exhausted at the four corners of the ceiling by two large rotary fans, and at the sides of the arch of the auditorium are other large air ducts.

The operating room is probably ten feet long by eight feet wide and fifteen feet deep. In the center of the ceiling is an opening fully five feet square, extending through the roof; also there are large windows in front of the room opening directly to the outer air. The floor and walls are of cement, painted slate color, and white above. The floor is carpeted with old gold velvet carpet.

The equipment consists of two Powers 6, motor driven machines, set on special stands; a dissolver, and a spotlight. These are in charge of L. D. Read, a member of the Seattle union, who has been with Mr. Clemmer over five years.

The current is taken through two large rheostats, and Mr. Read here springs a new one. These resistances are located just outside the operating room, and right close to them he has a 16-inch electric fan running full blast, which takes away so much of the heat from the coils that I laid my hands on the coils of the rheostat and found them to be just comfortably warm. Mr. Read has a telephone in the operating room, and a clock and a motor rewind.

The wall shutters are arranged on the plan favored in Seattle, which, no doubt, is fairly effective, but like so many others, depends on the operator to close the shutter, if they are to close, quickly; the fusible links being located fully three and a half feet from the aperture. Brother Read is supplied with a slide showing a clock face with movable hands, and between each reel, the correct time is thrown on the screen—a very great convenience to the audience.

Ushers, uniformed in light brown, with the house monogram in gold, are in attendance. There are thirteen in all, working on different shifts. The basement of the theater is a splendidly equipped gymnasium, supplied with shower bath, for the employees.

BRITISH NOTES.

(Special Correspondence to the WORLD.)

THIS week has seen the entrance into the realms of photoplay production of another personage of distinction, this time the Countess of Warwick. She comes part as authoress and part as producer for, I understand, she will personally supervise the taking of her subjects. After all that has been said and written on both sides of the "streak" about motion picture production becoming the "hobby" of the aristocracy, there is one decided advantage in taking up scripts from a person like the Countess. Mr. A. H. Kisch and Mr. E. Barker, two new, young producers, have evidently realized this to the full for they have successfully persuaded her ladyship to lend them the beautiful Warwick Castle along with another fine estate in Essex for the scenic purposes of the plays. Her first production will be, however, of a highly sensational order centering around the pearl necklace mystery, but, says the Countess, "I really want to produce educational films in dramatic form. There is much history that is practically unknown in the Warwick archives and I have two incidents now in mind that will form admirable subjects for dramatic treatment. They concern Piers Gaveston and Isobel, one of the daughters of the King-maker, who married that Duke of Clarence who was drowned in the butt of Malmsey. Every care will be taken to guard against such anachronisms as have been apparent in some recent films and a member of the council of the Archaeological Society will be retained to give expert advice."

Apropos of my remarks in the last letter, respecting Mr. W. N. Selig's visit, that gentleman has now left for a brief visit to France and Germany but will be back again in this country in time for the Manchester Exhibition where the Selig Company are to have a stand. By the way, from what I had whispered to me by Mr. Montague last Monday, there seems to be a probability of the genial "W. N. S." being mistaken for a traveling menagerie proprietor on his return to New York.

During a tour through filmland the other day an American gentleman complained about the recent criticisms in the London press on the trivial errors committed by American producers of English historic subjects. American producers can be consoled with the information that they are not alone with their anachronisms. I saw a film a day or two ago entitled "King Charles," a historical drama by the Clarendon Company, prepared by a well known trade journalist. With the exception of one or two minor incongruities the subject is a paragon of general excellence and although the heads of the medievals are trimmed on the latest American lines and some of the Cavaliers march out to battle in full court costume, the spectacular parts have been cleverly executed.

Mr. Geo. R. Sims' novel "Ostler Joe" is announced for release here shortly by the Edison Company. Ordinarily the copyright for filming this author's works has been vested in the Gaumont Company but the Edison company have taken over the production of this notable story.

Mr. C. A. Willat, of New York, was in London recently for a day or two negotiating for the representation in this country of the Willat Film Corporation.

Mr. Carl Van Hoffman, of the Universal Film Company, along with Mr. Fred Lee, has just left London after having taken a few lengths of film illustrating the sights of London. They are touring the capitals of the world and are at the moment handle-turning on the Continent. The tour, which is to secure a cosmopolitan and unique series of travel pictures, is expected to last three years.

Col. Seely, the Secretary for War, has intimated that he disapproves of the use of British soldiers for moving picture purposes. Producers are asking why he allowed them to appear in the Waterloo film.

The film showing the Johnson-Jeffries fight, which has been exhibited here recently, has been prohibited at Leeds. The picture was, however, successfully shown at Birmingham and Bradford.

Some time ago I described the remarkable trained insect pictures of Prof. Lozshki, of Moscow, and his method of production. I am informed on the same reliable authority that a new and even better series will shortly be released and handled by the Pegasus Film Co.

* * *

The British and Colonial Company still continue to be the pioneer producers, on this side, of ultra-sensational subjects. The other afternoon for the purpose of staging a shipwreck scene they purchased the abandoned liner, "Marie Leonhardt," which ran aground on the Goodwin Sands two years ago. Eight actors mounted the derelict, but were immediately knocked off by a breaker, most of them sustaining injuries. Nothing daunted they made a fresh start and managed satisfactorily until the explosion scene. The dynamite went off prematurely and Ernest Batley was blown a distance into the sea. He was picked up in an injured condition by the Ramsgate lifeboat. The film embodying these incidents will be entitled "The Tattooed Will."

An outstanding achievement in productive work is that of a new firm, the A. C. L. Feature Film Company, who have, before the conclusion of the actual trial in the law courts, produced a lengthy subject woven around the recent pearl necklace mystery. The entire subject, including many scenes upon the exact spots mentioned in the police court case, has been produced with greater speed than many an ordinary topical.

Sir J. Forbes-Robertson, who has often been described as England's most illustrious actor, will reach the American metropolis a few days in advance of this communication to complete his farewell tour. Before leaving he said, "I am pleased to have had an opportunity of playing for the kinema. It was a novel and extremely interesting experience, but I soon discovered that it is a special art. From an educational point of view I consider the possibilities of the kinema enormous; but, when I approach the subject from the dramatic point of view I am faced with the problem as to whether it will do the legitimate theater harm or good. In the first place, I think that at present they take away a certain portion of the usual audiences of the suburban and provincial theaters; but, secondly, I feel convinced that in the end they will, provided proper plays are produced by men who know their work, increase the theater-going public and stimulate a greater demand for good, healthy drama. Again, I feel, taking into consideration that a large proportion of the patrons of kinema theaters are children, that it is a good thing for them to see a scholarly play produced upon the screen. No one will deny that one of Shakespeare's plays is better as an educational item than a cowboy drama. Understand, I do not intend to cast the slightest reflection upon the cowboy pictures because I think they convey a breath of atmosphere which it would be impossible to create upon any stage. But from the purely intellectual standard a Shakespearian play must essentially be of greater value than buck-jumpers."

The Vitagraph Company may shortly be in a position to adorn, if they wish, their signpost with the Royal coat of arms. At a performance before the Princess Royal in Scotland, last week, four of the nine films exhibited were by the Vitagraph Company. These were: "A Fighting Chance," "A Regiment of Two," "The Freshet," and "The Prize Box."

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Borders.

BEING both the manager of the Cando (N. D.) Opera House and the editor of the Democrat, Carl Nelson can boss the way his advertising for the house is set up, and he sends in a nicely displayed advertisement set with a flag border and writes:

> I am inclosing you herewith a copy of my show ad, the same being clipped from my own paper, The Democrat, published here. The flag border is used whenever I have military subjects. Other borders are being selected that will be typical of the subjects advertised.
> I keep an ad of this size in both of the weekly papers published here, and the space is increased whenever I have big features. I also get out bills for every one of my "movie" performances, giving the titles of the reels, etc. I have four reels Tuesdays and Thursdays—10c. and 15c., and six reels on Saturdays—15c. and 25c. Always have a packed house.

Using a flag border for a patriotic or military subject is an excellent idea and it fits particularly well with Stars and Stripes Forever—the subject advertised in the copy to hand. Mr. Nelson is building up a stock of borders that will be appropriate to the styles of subjects shown and in time he will probably have a line that will enable his patron, almost at a glance, to tell what sort of subject the chief reel is.

The style book of the American Type Foundry contains innumerable samples, and it is possible to buy your own borders and hold them for your own use that no other advertiser may employ the same border. It entails a comparatively small outlay, two feet of border costing from $1.35 to about $2 for a font; which will set most advertisements, and at once your advertisement becomes distinctive.

Even better, where you have a distinctive trade mark for your house, would be ad cuts, which are cast reproductions of any design on metal bases. They cost a little more than stock stuff, but they give an individuality to the advertising that is worth much more than the initial outlay and they last a long time if properly handled. For advertising work it is better to have them cast on the point system and by six point advances; either six, twelve or eighteen point.

Where the expenditures must be carefully considered and the eight or ten dollars required for a series of borders or even the two dollars for a single font is beyond the advertising allowance, which is very seldom, wayside ornaments or Collins' florets can be had as low as fifteen cents each.

Special Borders.

Now and then it will pay to buy special borders, as, for example, the double armed cross of the anti-tuberculosis society for use in conjunction with the Red Cross Christmas Seal story that Edison releases each year. The crosses may be had for five to twenty cents each or from fifty cents to a dollar for a font of six inches. You can get, for instance, about fourteen thirty-six-point crosses for seventy-five cents, and these can be used on your circulars, in the papers or on any printed matter. Keep away from the generally used borders such as the Klondike, Flame and Bullfinch and you will be able to procure something distinctive and yet inexpensive. There is a special catalogue of electro cuts that can be had on application that will give a cut that can be adapted for almost any purpose. Don't be entirely dependent on the printer. Borrow his sample book and study it. Then buy the type yourself and you can keep it to yourself. We have a little fifteen cent wayside ornament on our personal stationery that has created all sorts of comment because it was carefully chosen.

We Hear from Bert Williams.

Bert Williams didn't die, though he did not write this department, but he is buried in a small town, Glenwood, Minn. He is still interested in that league of program publishers and in touch with many of them. He is getting out a small paper, as yet just one sheet printed on both sides, that carries some catchlines and advertising hints and that promises to develop into something better. When it keeps its promise we'll have more to say about it. It is an interesting sheet as it is, and it's time that the program publishers got together.

Their Own Weekly.

The Olympian Theater, Seattle, has two weeklies. One is a house organ and the other is a reel of local topicals, but they ran to their twenty-sixth issue before they sent us a copy—which is not at all clubby. It is a newsy little sheet and well printed, for a half tone cut comes up unusually well on cheap news stock. One paragraph, evidently referring to a Pathe, a Vitagraph and a Melies, is applicable to many programs these days. Others will find it useful filler.

> In one of the recent Olympian programs one film was photographed in France, the next in China and the following one in New Zealand. This is not remarkable in view of the fact that the cinematograph camera is in constant use all over the earth, but when we stop to consider the fact that the whole world in action can be seen right in our own neighborhood it is truly wonderful. It brings home a realization of the great value of motion pictures as an educational medium.

Howard de Subers is still on the job, and one of his late ideas is the suggestion that we print in large type (about a ten point bold, please, Mr. Printer):

DOES YOUR COMPETITOR WORRY YOU?

WHAT DO YOU DO TO WORRY YOUR COMPETITOR?

and he suggests that a lot of good material will come our way. We shall see. Meantime our own opinion of the best way to worry our competitor is to pay more attention to our own business than to his. Let's see what you think.

In China.

The Kalem production of Arrah na Pogue was one of the recent features at the Arcade Theater, Tientsin, and the management got out an eight-page and cover booklet, along with the usual "expresses." We question the statement that the Kalem company chartered a special steamer on which to transport the company to Ireland, but the booklet is nicely gotten up. It is nearly two years since this subject was released, but the comment from this paper forms a part of the booklet, showing that the Arcade knows how to keep its material classified.

Old English Again.

The Lyric Theater, Prineville, Ore., sends in a couple of folders gotten out for Fair Week. They write:

> It's probably poor work, but remember that we are 25 miles from the railroad in a town of 1,200 and this is one of our first attempts at anything worth while. We turned out 1,250 of them and I have not seen a dozen lying around the street, so I guess they are appreciated by the public.

The piece is a four-page card folder about 2½ by 6, the third page having several frames of film stapled over the text already given in these columns. That is one reason why they were not thrown away. The public naturally is interested in what a piece of film looks like. The man who gets one of these wants to take it home and show the others. To keep it from being crushed some protection is needed and naturally nothing is better than the card to which it is fastened. That's one perfectly good little old scheme, but the better the scheme, the better the use that should be made of it. The front page merely announces that it is a "Souvenir program of features at the Lyric Theater, Prineville, Ore., Fair Week, September 21st to 27th, 1913."

Now that doesn't say very much at best. It does not point out where it will first catch the eye that on every one of those seven days a special two-reel feature and one other reel will be shown. Of course, it tells that inside, but the place for the big point is on the cover, in most cases, and this is one of the cases. At best there is a lost opportunity, but to complicate matters every blessed letter is on Old English text that is useless at best and worse than useless in the smaller sizes.

This sample and the accompanying letter both carry the name of the town in puzzle type. The letter was in part devoted to another matter and the subscription clerk had first to take off the name and address before we could retain the sheet for copy. The clerk read the name quickly and got it Princeville. It was not carelessness. It was merely that he had to guess at it, and that holds goods of every other word on that front page. There is no use printing stuff that cannot be read, and this does not refer to Mr. Morgan alone, but to every other exhibitor who lets the printer ring in Old English on him.

This advertisement was presumably distributed on the fair grounds where people are in a hurry and may not stop to read. The plainest possible type and the biggest possible appeal is needed. Suppose that front page had read:

> Ever see a
> Here's a piece
> Three Thousand Feet
> Are shown at the
> Lyric Theater
> each night.
> This week a > Splendid
> Two Part
> Feature.
> Different every day.
> See list inside.

As it is there is only one ten-point line at the top of page two, reading merely "Two-reel features," to tell the public that it is being given more than the usual money's worth.

A series of seven two-reel pictures in a country town should be worth more noise than that. If we could do no better we would have used the side and bottom margins of both inside pages with such lines as:

"Not only in two parts, but more than twice as good."

"Double length—but triple value.

"The highest form of photoplay."

Mr. L. C. Morgan has found a new form of the film card and book marker already written up. We think that next time he'll know how to put more punch into his appeal. We gather that the three advertisements on the back page pay a large part of the cost. They should, because these ads will last in value so long as the card is retained. On the same argument there should have been some lasting chat about the value of the regular Lyric programs.

Too Crowded.

The Idle Hour, Hyannis, Mass., tries to get three programs with two or three titles, each and all in large type on a bill 5 by 14½. It is a list that shows three good programs, but the bill is so crowded that no one but a fan would take the trouble to read it through. The man who wants to go and merely wants to see what will be shown will read it, but the jumble of black type will not catch and hold the attention of the casual patron or the man who does not go at all, yet he is the person that advertising should be done for. The well displayed advertisement of one program and an underline for the others would have done more good, or perhaps the three specials in bold type and less prominent mention of the others. This would have given space for a few words of commendation. There is just one line that stands out and that is because it is in a much heavier face than the others. For the rest it looks as though some small office had emptied all of its job faces on the stone. It hurts a man more to get one stiff punch than to be spanked on the wrist a dozen times in a perfectly ladylike fashion. Work advertising on the same lines and put the stiff punch in.

Two Styles.

W. A. Kinney, of the Casino Theater, Louisville, sends in a dodger printed both in English and Hebrew for "The Curse of the Golden Land." It was previously shown at the Orpheum and, as Mr. Kinney explains, it was brought back by request of many of their Jewish patrons. We will have to pass up the top portion of the bill, but the lower half is well phrased.

Sends a Check.

Edmund Reid, of the Palace Theater, Milledgeville, Ga., sends a letter with a check for two cents to pay for two minutes of the recipient's time. We think it a good investment, for he sends out a letterhead that impresses one with the excellence of the show because the letter itself is so well gotten up. The check, too, is as ornate as those the late The Great Lafayette used to use, printed in brown on cream watered paper to match the letter, the latter having a designed head that would grace a metropolitan house. A man who wants a letterhead like that wants a good show in his house. The check scheme seems to work very well. Have you tried it?

Mr. Reid is a little careless in his phrasing when he says that "I want you to know that we are showing a better class of moving pictures—more real feature fotoplays than ever before, if not superior to those of the past." If they are of a better class, naturally they are superior.

Another Weekly.

The Motion Picture Weekly, now in its seventeenth number, lists the programs of several of the Springfield, Ohio, theaters. It is well printed, the advertising is well displayed and it has the "regular" look of a paper that belongs. A little more reading matter would not hurt if kept to the present standard, and we think that more reading matter would bring more advertising, since the advertiser would be apt to argue that a publication with more text would be more thoroughly read. A uniformity of type selection is by no means the least creditable feature. A program that looks like a type catalogue does not look right even to the untrained eye. The run-in program, where space is not unlimited, works nicely, and this sample may be useful to others.

PRINCESS SUNDAY

Mary Fuller and Augustus Phillips in "A Light On Troubled Waters," Edison Drama. "Baby Indisposed" and "The Lady in Black," Biograph comedies, with Grace Lewis.

PRINCESS MONDAY

Building.

J. B. Ashton, whose name is familiar to readers of this department, though he has not sent anything in of late, is building a new house at Provo, Utah. Starting with a store show seating two hundred, he has successively opened a number of houses and now he is starting to build a steel and cement theater with a full sized stage to seat 1,400. His present houses are the Princess and the Ellen, the latter being the second of the name. It just goes to show what sound judgment and good management will do, as opposed to flash sensationalism and a business eyesight that does not look beyond the day's receipts.

Another Stallings Scheme.

A. L. Stallings, of the Angelus Theater, Spanish Fork, Utah, has a new scheme which he explains in this letter:

> I am inclosing herewith an Educational Matinee certificate for the pupils of the public schools. As it is just about time for the schools to open for the year I thought perhaps other exhibitors might be interested so I am mailing the only copy I have at the present time, which happened to be the proof.
> Some time ago I met the Superintendent of the Public Schools of Spanish Fork and put the proposition before him in this way: that if they would take my proposition up and encourage the children, that I would make them a 2½c. rate or the forty matinees for $1, payable in advance, and, furthermore, that if they succeed in getting more than five hundred, that they could have the balance for the school treasury; this certainly appealed to them and they came back at me this way, that I should have the first five hundred dollars and they would take the next hundred and give me the balance, and they feel like they can reach the eight hundred mark, as there are nearly fourteen hundred enrolled. I will consider myself very fortunate if I receive five hundred dollars, as my matinees have been very poor in the past and this will certainly be good advertising for my house. I also intend to give each and every teacher a season pass good for any night; this I am sure will keep their interest up, and perhaps I can work up a fairly good Saturday afternoon matinee.
> Yours truly,
> A. L. STALLINGS.

Here is the text of the admission card:

ANGELUS THEATER

SCHOOL CHILDREN SEASON MATINEE CERTIFICATE

Issued to....................................Age...............

School ....................................Grade..............

This will admit the above pupil to each and every EDUCATIONAL MATINEE given under the supervision of the Spanish Fork Public Schools at the Angelus each and every Wednesday

Beginning ........................ Ending.....................

.................................................... Teacher

.................................................... Manager

Not Transferable. Good for Educational Matinees only.

Ever since this department was started we have preached the wisdom of interesting the teachers and the school boards. Here is a practical scheme that will do good both to the pupils and the house management. We take it that special educational films will be shown on Wednesdays and we think that the interest will not be confined to the children and their teachers alone.

A Time Table.

JULIAN LOUIS LAMOTHE, head of the New Orleans Inquest Club, runs a photoplay department in the house program of the Fichtenberg enterprises. He has small space at his command, but he makes excellent use of it. In a recent issue he gives a time table of the length of time some companies require to pass on a script that will be useful to others, though we think that we would omit Pilot entirely. They assuredly are "uncertain" so far as their script department is concerned.

American—2 weeks to 2 months—very uncertain
Biograph—5 days to 3 weeks.
Crystal—3 weeks or more—uncertain.
Eclair—7 or 8 days.
Edison—3 to 4 weeks.
Essanay—5 days. If held, author is notified
Frontier—2 weeks.
Kalem—6 to 14 days.
Kay-Bee—2 weeks.
Keystone—2 to 5 weeks.
Lubin—6 to 10 days.
Majestic—2 weeks.
Pilot—Uncertain.
Reliance—6 to 28 days
Selig—5 days.
Solax—Uncertain; usually about 2 weeks.
Vitagraph—6 to 10 days. If held, author is notified.

Forcing a Situation.

One development of the increased demand for two reel stories seems to be a forcing of the situation for the sake of gaining dramatic contrast without regard for the other aspects of the plot. One of the very worst examples of what is meant was recently released by one of the licensed companies, the story being made from the script of a well known fiction writer and photoplay dramatist.

A man wrongly convicted on circumstantial evidence that would never result in a capital sentence in a court of law lies in prison waiting his electrocution. His soul-mate writes that at the moment of execution she is going to commit suicide that her soul may accompany his. Meantime the divorced wife of the hero is on a steamer with her soul-mate, who is the real murderer. The steamer is sinking and he sends a wireless confession.

This develops a striking three cornered situation, the girl waiting the hour of execution with the glass of poison before her, the man waiting the call of the officers of the law, and the turmoil of the wreck, but in his eagerness to create this situation the author with inexcusable carelessness overlooks the fact that no decent sort of man would let a girl kill herself merely because he has to die. He receives her letter some hours before the time set for his execution, but instead of getting someone to warn the girl's parents, he smiles fatuously, registers that he is pleased at this last tribute of affection, and never even crooks the end of his little finger to warn the parents. Because he must die for another's crime, he is quite content that the girl should kill herself. It is true that when his innocence is established he uses the telephone to advise the lady that his own excursion into the hereafter is postponed, but whatever effect the purely dramatic aspect of the situation may possess is wholly lost through this sacrifice of decency of feeling to the need for a situation. It is not always easy to decide at long range whether the author or producer is at fault in a production, but this seems to be a case where the fault clearly lies with the author, and yet the writer of the story is one of the best paid men in the business and fond of airing in print his argument that a good story cannot be written for less than a couple of hundred dollars.

The moral of all this is to be found in the suggestion that in working for the dramatic climax the various factors of that climax be carefully inquired into. It would have been as easy to have had the girl leave home, fearful that her parents would seek to prevent her purpose. Then the dramatic value would have been increased through the fruitless search for the girl, who could have been found at the moment she was about to complete her act of self-destruction. As it stands the story is revolting.

If You Live In Oakland.

If you live in Oakland, Cal., send a stamped and addressed envelope for the name of the organizer of a photoplay circle. If you have a San Francisco address and some ferry tickets, you can declare in.

Don't.

A correspondent writes that he has commenced to sell after his eleventh script—and a copy of Technique of the Photoplay—and adds that of the eleven he received 29 rejection slips, and is going to "scrap" two plays and fight for the others in the light of new knowledge.

Don't scrap any play. The most impossible, the most commonplace play may have in it the germs of greatness. Don't scrap any play. Do not urge it on any company if you think it will not sell, but you can sometimes work the seemingly hopeless plot into a success if you let it hang around long enough. Don't scrap anything unless you know it to be a rank—though unconscious—steal from the work of another. Even then you may be able to write a play from that that is in no sense a steal.

Jones, He Quits.

This doesn't mean that Marc Edmund has quit writing. Far from it. It means that he has come to a belated, but none the less sound, conclusion that he cannot give value for money in criticism at a dollar a year for an unlimited number of scripts. He has not only quit, but has advised the Photoplay Magazine to give up the so-called association. He writes that he cannot do the work justice. He might have added that no one can.

He went down to New Orleans the other day and right off Julian Louis Lamothe got up a dinner of the local circle to welcome him.

Here is a man up in New Haven, who writes his business letters with a lead pencil, who says in part that he wrote the personal experiences of one of a party of film fanatics, "arranging it the necessary way the Film Companies require," and three short-sighted editors passed it back to him. "Then," he adds, "I wrote three plays myself and circulated them among my friends, so popular my plots became that it seemed that every Tom, Dick and Harry were encouraging me to have them screened." Again the foolish and somewhat nearsighted editors failed to recognize greatness. They passed several comments, one being that the script lacked action and the author comments, "Why my critics said it was all motion." (Motion, dear New Haven genius, is NOT action, but merely motion). And he wants to know "if a plot stands the acid test of forty critics, why is it unfit for screening?"

The answer is simple in the extreme. The forty critics, personal friends of the author, do not, collectively, know as much about action, plot development, dramatic values and studio conditions as any one of the shortsighted editors, and merely because they tell their friend his story is great, it does not necessarily follow that it really is. They know nothing of the practical conditions, they cannot possibly judge accurately or even approximate a guess. We would not waste so much space on the man from New Haven were it not that he is merely one of a most numerous type, who are ever ready to accept favorable criticism, no matter what the source, but who refuse to consider expert judgment and profit by it. Not even the manager of the local theater can tell you whether your story is good or bad, or why, and yet—but why continue?

In Error.

A correspondent ungallantly argues that the business of writing stories would be better if the women would keep out. It would be better in the sense that more stories would be sold by the men, but he doesn't mean it quite that way, arguing that no woman can write a decently good play.

There's Miss Maibelle Heikes Justice, who has gone into the woods to get color for some order stories for Selig, and who has just completed a big five-reel play. There is Miss Hetty Gray Baker, who is doing the adaptations of the Jack London stories for Bosworth, Inc. There is Mrs. Breuil, who wrote a couple of hundred stories for Vitagraph and who is doing splendidly as a free lance, and first, last and all the time there is Miss Gene Gauntier, who has written more scripts and more good scripts than any man we know of, including ourself.

We do not believe in votes for women, but we most assuredly do believe in scripts by women, yessir!

Another of Those.

The latest is the — - System of Writing Photoplays. The advertiser says that he has opened an office for the purpose of bringing new writers to the front, "being coached along on this idea by the managers of two of the largest motion picture theaters in this city."

We do not see where the managers come in to "coach." They know nothing of the business themselves, and Mr. ——— merely proclaims himself a writer of short stories and vaudeville sketches, yet he "reads, criticises, rewrites and places the scripts in the hand of the makers, relieving them of the burden of reading poor and unsalable plays." Whereat several editors who are to be "relieved" of this burden respectfully make request that they be put on record as saying that the ——— system plays will not find a welcome in their office any more than the product of other correspondence schools and bureaus.

Selling Talk.

"I've sent these stories to the two companies most likely to take them," begins a recent letter, "but they have been returned. The first went to Biograph and American."

That's the answer. The story was a polite but not striking comedy; not at all in line with the sharply defined Biograph style. It was not a likely market. It was the most unlikely market we could imagine. American was no better as a choice. They make little or no comedy, and yet these two are the "most likely" markets and on the strength of their rejections the author decides that the case is hopeless.

The case was hopeless because the story was not good, but the result would have been the same if the story had been good.

It is just as important to be able to sell a story as to be able to write one. No rejection by any company can determine the value of a story nor, for that matter, can the rejection by all existing companies determine the lack of merit. Repeated rejections argue some fault, but they do not prove lack of merit.

A few months ago a story was rejected by a conference of directors because it was utterly without merit. A second company which exercises a far nicer judgment in the matter of stories not only took it, but paid well for it.

In another instance a story was rejected by a company and sent to a second. The second company rejected the script and volunteered the information that there was no plot, merely a worked out incident. Meantime the first company had asked the author to re-submit the manuscript, which had been rejected through mistake, and the second time sent a check. One story was recently accepted by a company within five weeks after the first rejection, the story having been sent the company a second time through an oversight. The second time the story came in when a story of that type was wanted and so it was taken.

We know of more than one story rejected by practically every company on the list selling on the second trip around, and scripts fully revised and returned to the rejecting company frequently go through.

All of this is well understood by the veteran author. We rewrote one story four times before it was found acceptable by the Munsey company and it is no joke to rewrite a 25,000 word manuscript three times; but it sold on its fourth submission.

The moral of all this is to study the market closely and with intelligence. Find out just what a Biograph story is before you decide that you have a Biograph story, and do not determine that your comedy is just in the Melies style when Melies makes no comedy. Know your market and keep in touch with the changes. Even then do not accept rejection as proof positive of a lack of merit. Some stories have even been turned down because they were too good, others for reasons that have absolutely no connection with the script. We know one company that will not accept stories showing blind persons, yet other companies do not regard blindness as a bar to acceptance. Surely it is foolish to argue that a story about a blind person rejected by this company is worthless merely because the company has rejected the story in deference to the personal prejudice of the owner. Study the stories of the films of each issue of this paper. Learn your market intimately and then plan to market your wares with the smallest expenditure of stamps. The business of being an author is not confined to writing stories. The other half of authorship lies in selling stories and writing stories that will sell.

Script Sense.

"I'm sure it's better than Dash's Blankety Blank," began an author the other day and then went on to tell the story of the script that was better. It throws a sidelight on the inability of an author to sense stories. The "better than" was not the work of the author, but a friend, but the point remains the same. The story was not better. It was more flashy, it had more apparent action, but it was manufactured sentiment all the way through.

Ever steal one of those curliquew dinguses off a wedding cake when you were a child and try to munch it? It looked just like the rest of the icing, but it was more attractive because it was a curliquew dingus, but it was plaster of paris and not sugar and white of egg and it didn't taste at all good.

Lots of stories look all right at a quick glance; they look better than others, in fact, but it is what gets over on the screen and from there to the minds of the spectators that really counts. For that matter an eight-sheet in four colors may be more attractive at a distance than the canvas of an old master worth more than all the lithographs used in a season, and yet the canvas may be more artistic.

One of the most valuable gifts a photoplay writer may possess is sound judgment; a judgment that passes the apparent value of the script and gets down to the eventual value of the filmed story. It is this that makes the difference between a mere writer and a real script editor. The editor may be but an indifferent script writer and yet, if he can arrive at the actual value of the scripts of others, he is worth far more to a manufacturer than the most brilliant writer in the business.

Writers, too, can get this quality if they will look beneath the flash for the real merit. The story that lives in memory, and that, in consequence, does the company lasting good, is not the big sensation, or the flashy production, but the one that had real merit to it.

If you have been a steady photoplay patron for four years, try and remember some of the Biograph comedies of three or four years ago. Which one—quick, now? All on account of the milk? There you have the answer. Biograph put out a lot of good comedy about that time, stuff that is much more pretentious than the milk story, but first off nine out of ten regulars will recall the milk story where they have forgotten the rest. The rest have been forgotten, but that is remembered, not because it was flashy or sensational, but because it was solidly good.

That's the way with a lot of the stuff that is "better than" the produced stuff. It looks big, it sounds big, but it doesn't get produced because the intelligent editor knows that there is no real story back of the flashy incident.

If we ever start a school (which Heaven forbid!) the first eleven lessons will be in the art of detecting the real story from the false. The next ten will be on the same lines. The last lesson will be on technical form and the pupil will be dismissed.

No Indians Wanted.

Trying to answer a request for the names of companies that would put on an Indian drama, we could not reply with any definiteness. There are Indian plays produced, but none of the companies will state that they desire Indian dramas. They are played out. The Indian held the center of the stage for a long time, but he is on his way, so give your attentions to something else.

For a time there is going to be a good market for some author with a new line of thought. Others will quickly follow into the field, of course, but the man who can lead the way to something as popular as the Western dramas is going to coin some money. Four years ago only two or three companies would make Western plays and then, almost overnight, there came a demand for such plays and the market was flooded. Editors who, turned back Westerners with scorn fairly begged for them, because it was found that the European market would absorb a large number. At present there is nothing in sight that is really in demand.

The popular type of play must be simple, inexpensive to produce and capable of giving large returns. That was what favored the Western play for a time. They cost little to make, required comparatively little story and yet sold tremendously well.

Points a Moral.

Some time ago an author wanted us to kill a few persons in photoplay departments. They were not acting nicely and he wanted to see the blood run. What he got was the advice to sit on a figurative cake of ice and watch it melt.

Strange to say he took the advice and now he writes to report that he sold one of the offenders a script for $60 and received a request for more submissions, so he writes to thank the man that put "ice" in advice.

It doesn't pay to get all het up and raise a row. If you can't sell a company and are positive that you can't, don't order out the lions and start a private Quo Vadis. It doesn't help any and it may hurt where least expected. Keep right on plugging, and whenever you have an exceptionally good story, send it to the offending company just to let them read it and get their goats when another company takes it and makes a hit with it. Then send them the next extra good one and in the course of time you'll sell, but you can't sell anywhere if you lose your temper and answer back either in or out of print

Inquiries.

NOTE—No questions can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. A list of addresses to which photoplays may be sent will be mailed on receipt of a STAMPED AND ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of a script.

A. G.—"The Battle of Gettysburg" was made in the vicinity of Los Angeles, since the original battlefield is dotted with monuments to the different regiments. The western Essanay companies all work at Niles, California. For a time Mr. Mackley had a company at Los Angeles, but he went on a vacation and the rest went back to Niles.

W. L.—Instead of getting sore over your treatment, which does no good, write the companies that you withdraw your script and will hold them responsible for any use they may make of it. Then copy the carbon and send the new ribbon script somewhere else. It doesn't pay to get sore and be marked down as a kicker. Take it all as a part of the game. Some of your points are well taken, but if you play the game, play the game according to the ground rules.

MRS. J. D. J.—Suppose your next door neighbor walked into your house and took enough flour from your supply for her week's baking. Wouldn't you call that stealing because you had paid for the flour and she had not asked you for it? You cannot use a magazine story without the permission of the person who paid for it. In buying the magazine you merely buy the right to read; not to make it into a photoplay. Photoplays cannot be copyrighted before being published. Your redress, if needed, lies in common and not copyright law. It is seldom necessary to take any precaution if you deal with the reputable companies and not with the wildcats.

E. B.—We are sorry that we cannot inform you where the scenes in question were made. We believe that it was an American production, though the company now has a section in England.

RUBENA—You are going back on your Answers Man. Only one letter and that all questions! Miss Anna Nillson is the only woman player mentioned in that Kalem. Mr Johnson has no brother in pictures. You are the only regular questioner from your city. We have not seen Mr. Powers in late Vitagraphs and opine that he has wented. Miss Sweet is still with the Biograph.

W. E. D.—If by copyrighting a "name" you mean title, it cannot be done. A title alone cannot be copyrighted because copyright is intended to protect published literary and artistic products and a title alone is not a literary product.

N. CHI.—Better keep away from the company you mention. Stick to the companies having an outlet for their product. It is the safest plan.

C. D. M.—You are splitting hairs in your first question. If you have a ruling device on your machine and a stylo pen to fit, rule the underline in ink. If you have no such device, then use the underline key. If you had no underline at all and the story was good, it would sell as well. It is "safe" to send to the western sections, but we understand that Vitagraph western is not in the market. Mr. Melville buys his own scripts. Why not send for sample copies of the two magazines and see which you like the better? Our personal preference is for the former.

E. D.—Your right to use your own published story for a photoplay depends on the form of release you signed when you signed for your story check. Most companies reserve "all rights," which would make it necessary for you to obtain their written permission.

H. A. K.—Your first question is answered on page 159 of Technique. Each scene must be numbered for identification and two actions in the same setting, but broken by a time leader are two distinct scenes, since a scene is all of the action in one set at one time. Try Keystone and Bison with the two reeler.

M. C.—It is not possible to obtain the information you desire so far in advance. Telephone the Famous Players the day you want to see the picture, or the day before.

E. T.—If you want to send along an addressed envelope large enough to contain a postcard picture, you will be welcome to one.

17 Madison Avenue - New York City

Projection Department

Conducted by F. H. RICHARDSON

Some Very Interesting Data.

AT the last meeting of the Pittsburg section of the Illuminating Engineering Society, April 18, 1913, a very interesting paper, entitled: "The Illumination of Motion Picture Projectors," was read by Mr. J. Frank Martin. Mr. Martin, after commenting on the magnitude of the motion picture industry, says:

> This attendance of these theaters as compared with the total number of people who are habitual readers by means of artificial light shows, that if the general impression that the motion picture seriously affects the eye is correct, the illuminating engineer is confronted with a problem which is not receiving the attention which its importance demands.
> From the beginning, wherever electric current was available, the electric arc has been the only source of light considered. The requirements for a satisfactory projector illuminant are: first, as near an approach to a point source of light as possible; and, second, the most intense source of light available. The carbon arc is the nearest approach to these requirements, and the modern motion picture projector has practically been built around the arc.

All of which is quite true. We are just beginning to awake to the fact that far too little attention has been paid to the projection light source. The moving picture projector has literally been built around the electric arc, but, beyond the endeavor of carbon manufacturers to construct a carbon which would burn evenly and give a steady light, no attention whatever has been paid to the question of the arc itself, or rather to the production of a light of a given tone and color value. Mr. Martin's paper contains, in my judgment, a number of minor errors, but it also contains a great deal of food for thought, and opens a big field for study and experiment on the part of operators. Speaking of the characteristics of the projector arc, Mr. Martin says:

> Figure 1 shows the voltage at the arc on both direct and alternating current, using a type of carbon which is widely used, at varying current densities. The arc gap, size of carbons and alignment of carbons was adjusted for each current value so as to give the most stable performance.

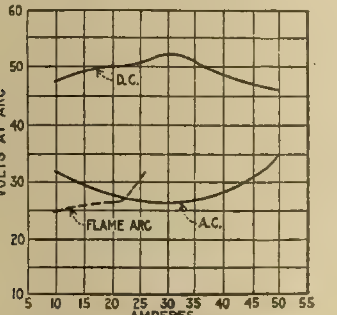

Fig. 1.—Characteristics of projector arcs.

> The dotted line in figure 1 represents a special flaming arc carbon, and the curve is representative for both alternating and direct current.

This particular diagram is a thing for which I have been long looking but did not know it was in existence. I hope it is reliable. A study of those curves is of great interest, and incidentally, it proves that my selection of 48 as the average projection arc voltage for d. c. is very nearly correct. It will be observed that at 10 amperes the voltage stands just a trifle more than 45, and rises sharply to 50 at approximately 18½ amperes, where it remains stationary to about 23 amperes, then rising sharply to a maximum of about 52 at 30 amperes, when it again drops to 50 at about 36½ amperes and to 48 at 40 amperes, and down to about 42 at 50 amperes. The a.c. arc, on the other hand, starts in at about 32 volts at 10 amperes, and drops down to something like 26½ at 30 amperes, whence it gradually rises to 35 volts at 50 amperes. The reliability of these curve values will depend altogether, solely and entirely on whether or not the arc length was so changed as to maintain the best projection light at the varying current densities. As between 10 amperes and 50 amperes there would be a considerable adjustment necessary, and if these curves were taken by merely varying the current densities (amperes), without adjusting the arc length to maintain the best illumination of the field, then they are of little or no value. But, at any rate, they form an interesting study and competent operators who are so inclined will find the making of such charts to be of great interest. We should be glad to see some charts made by operators. The process of making them is as follows: first draw a series of squares, similar to that shown in figure 1, and mark the voltage and amperes at the side and bottom as shown. Now let us say you start at 20 amperes. Adjust your light so that you get the best possible illumination on the screen, without any film or slide in, of course. When your amperage reaches exactly 20, and the light is adjusted precisely, take an exact reading of the voltage across the arc, being sure that your voltmeter wires make good contact, so as to get a correct reading. Supposing it is d. c. and the voltmeter reads exactly 50 volts. Make a dot at the crossing of the 20 ampere line and the 50 volt line. Now increase the amperage to 25 and, after adjusting the light, take another voltmeter reading, which we will assume to be 27 volts. With a scale locate the exact point on the 25 ampere line where your 27 volt dot should come, and then proceed to take readings by five ampere jumps as high as you want to go, after which connect these dots with a line, and you will have a thoroughly reliable, accurate voltage curve line of your arc.

Another point touched upon by Mr. Martin is treated as follows:

> It is very important that the size of the carbon and the relative diameter of the core and shell be closely regulated to the current density. Both the stability of the arc and the intensity of light may be materially increased by varying the dimensions of the carbons used.

Mr. Martin here emphasizes a point which has been touched upon in this department, and which is, to some extent, dealt with in the Handbook; but he brings out a new point, viz.: the size of the core as well as the diameter of the carbon should match the current density. Now, I do not know just what experiments have been made by carbon manufacturers along these lines, nor do I know exactly what measure of importance attaches to the relative diameter of the core and shell of projector carbons. We all know that the core is an important item, without which good projection light would be practically impossible; but just what the effect would be of using, for instance, a ⅝ carbon with a standard core on 30 amperes, and then increasing the current density to 40 amperes without changing the core size. I am unable to say (I assume that ⅝ is correct for both 30 and 40 amperes). Personally, I believe, however, that far too little attention is paid to matching the size of the carbon to the current density. The size of the core in various carbons, of course, varies in proportion to the diameter of the carbon, and it is quite possible that the core size would automatically take care of itself where the size of the carbon itself changes to meet the exact requirement of various current densities.

It is also possible that better results could be had by using smaller or larger cores in the carbons than those now used in standard. I do not know, and I know of nobody else who does know, though I shall make an endeavor to find out what has been done in the way of experiment along these lines.

Mr. Martin's paper contains several other interesting and important things and this discussion will, therefore, be

Chicago Answered.

Shreveport, Louisiana, writes:

> In August 9th issue, Mr. W. A. Rosenblum, Chicago, Illinois, sets forth a trouble similar to one I myself experienced, and which I found to be due to defective carbon cores. It may be possible that Mr. Rosenblum will find this to be the source of his difficulty also. The cores of my carbons had been damp and had dried out again, which caused the substance to become harder than it should have been, and the cores formed into little lumps, which lay loose and fell out under the action of the current, causing the carbons to flame badly and to discolor the condensers also. I am a member of Local 222, I. A. T. S. E., Shreveport, La., but am now visiting my people, and trying to recover my health, in Sandford, North Carolina; but I hope to be twisting the crank with the boys again soon.

There is nothing that will cause light trouble quicker than a defective carbon core. It not only causes the carbon to flame somewhat, but to also sputter, or flutter, badly. I have spoken of the necessity for perfect carbon cores a number of times in the department. In purchasing carbons operators should always examine the bundle, and see that the cores appear to be perfect. If any of them seem to be imperfect the bundle should be rejected. Let us hope your health will improve and that you will soon again be putting the silent players through their paces on the screen.

From Chicago.

The following letter comes from Chicago. I am almost afraid to publish it because if the business agent of the Chicago Operators' Union finds out there is a man in that city possessed of all that knowledge, he probably will not rest easy until he has chased him over the Illinois state line. Chicago writes as follows:

> I was disappointed to find you falling down on a point which, to my mind, seems very important and that is the reason for this letter. On page 1063, September 6th issue, you discuss a storage battery problem. I am forced to the conclusion that you must not have given the storage battery the same careful consideration you have other electrical devices. A storage battery is a very dependable, efficient and rugged device. It is not necessaray to use any resistance when charging same from a dynamo, as the generator voltage would be varied as the charging progressed. It is possible to charge and discharge at the same time, or charge the entire battery and discharge any fractional part of it simultaneously. The voltage of the current flowing out will be, roughly, two times the number of cells in the fraction, irrespective of the impressed voltage or the size of the battery. These facts are demonstrated every day by every train in your beloved subway, every electrically cranked railway car, and in every automobile which is electrically cranked and lighted. The brother in Montfort has outlined what seems to me, in the light of the best engineering experience, the best system where outside direct current is not available. You lost sight of the most important part—the end cell switch. The objection which you raise as to the buckling of the plates is the only one which I can conceive as applying. But when one considers the chemico-mechanical nature of the process involved, and the time required, I see no reason why an operator who can strike an arc without blowing a 40 A. fuse, should not be able to start his lamp on a reasonably heavy battery without injuring the plates. Montford should install a 56 cell, 100 ampere hour battery, with a triple 6 point end cell switch at each end of the outfit. The lamp is connected through a D. P., T. D. pole-changing switch, from the center to the first brush of the end switches. This allows either half of the battery to be used on the arc, with a range of about 14 volts, in steps of 2 volts, and a maximum of 65. The dynamo is connected to the second set of brushes and, at full charge of the entire battery, should deliver about 130 volts, which ought to be possible for any 110 volt outfit. The third set of brushes feeds the lights and fans, and is set at 110, without regard to what the dynamo is doing. Of course, the time the arc burns on each half of the battery should be evened up as nearly as possible. Any standard handbook on storage batteries will give all the information necessary for the care of the battery and the handling of the end cells, and reasonable care will insure just as reliable service as any other part of the installation will give. If you wish to see the possibilities of a storage battery, visit a New York Edison battery sub-station. Such a trip will undoubtedly prove all my contentions, to your entire satisfaction. The best way to keep track of the current used is to install a recording wattmeter, or common electric meter. These instruments, for direct current, can be purchased cheaper than an ammeter or voltmeter. If any one is sufficiently interested in a storage battery installation such as I have described, I will gladly furnish a sketch for making the end cell switches and a diagram of the connections.
> I notice some of the brothers complaining of poor results with 25 cycles. When one considers the close approach to synchronism of the phase, in such a low frequency, with the cycle of the intermittent movement in a projector, the cause of a good deal of the trouble is apparent. Has any one ever tried a three-phase arc in such a case? Theoretically, such a device would overcome all difficulties inherent to the low frequency. Practically, I can think of no difficulties in installation or operation which cannot be overcome by a good mechanic, as every operator is (?). And three phase service ought to be available wherever single phase is supplied. Naturally, the wattage consumption for a given c. p. output will be the same with either service. Have you ever used the Churcher chemical cell for rectifying alternating current? This device requires more attention than a mercury tube, but is just as efficient, even more reliable, and can be built very cheaply by most any one. If it is worth while I will elaborate. Incidentally, there is only one person who is a better critic of the pictures than the operator, and that is the pianist. Sorry to have inflicted all this upon you, but this time it was your own fault. I will promise to stay on my own side of the fence in the future.

Well, Chicago, you are perfectly right in assuming I am not very well posted on the storage battery proposition. However, not being positive I was correct in my views, as set forth in the article you mention, I consulted a man who is supposed to be well posted on such matters and he told me that my reply was right, therefore I let it go. Now, I do not propose to enter into any argument with you at this time, but I am going to say that I have always understood that you could not charge a battery from a 110 volt dynamo without a lot of resistance. My understanding has been that were this attempted the battery would charge so fast that the plates would buckle. If I am wrong in this then I would be glad to be corrected. However, without going into this matter further at this time, I would like to have Chicago send in the sketch of the storage battery connection with explanations, making the thing as plain as possible, also explaining, in detail with sketches, just how a storage battery can be charged from a 110 volt generator without resistance. No, I do not even know what the "Churcher" chemical cell is, but I looked pretty thoroughly into the matter of chemical rectifiers a year or more ago, when the matter was discussed in the department, and, from all I could find out, they were not a good proposition for the rectifying of projection current. As to your remaining on your own side of the fence, why I do not want you to do anything of the kind. If you can contribute matter which is of value I shall be only too glad to have you do so. I do not make, and have never made any pretence of being perfect, or knowing it all. I do the best I can in the somewhat difficult position I occupy. I am pleased to get any and all the help possible, so do not be afraid of offending by disputing my conclusions when you think I am in error.

Quality of Light in Projection.

One point in projection has, in my judgment, received altogether too little consideration on the part of carbon makers and operators, viz.: effect of the quality of light used in projection. I quote from the official publication, entitled "Transactions of the Illuminating Engineering Society":

> The color value of the light used in projection is of small importance, unless it is considered from an esthetical viewpoint in conjunction with photographic processes. However, under present conditions, the combination of effects arising from the use of arcs, giving a bluish light and very contrasty photography gives exceedingly harsh impressions. The use of an arc in which yellow is the predominating color, would make a material improvement.

There is no doubt but what the criticism of the Engineering Society is correct, as applied to arcs giving off a light of bluish tint. There is no question as to their correctness in asserting that the addition of yellow to the light would give a more pleasing tone to the projection, particularly when used in conjunction with photography having sharp contrast, such as we find in a very large percentage of the present day film productions.

In this connection, as has been, upon several occasions, noted in the columns of this department, there seems to be a vast difference in the light quality of the current from various dynamos supposed to produce exactly the same thing. In handling d. c. projection arcs, the writer has often noticed, in changing from one house to another, that, although the current was, or was supposed to be, the same, there was a distinct difference in the effect at the arc. Whether other operators have noticed this or not I cannot say, but I have.

If you want to see the difference in light, visit a dozen different operating rooms, and observe the spot at the aperture of the machine in each place. In one you will find a bluish, dull lustreless spot. In another you will find a clear, brilliant spot, as round as a dollar, and almost as white as paper. In yet another you will find something else, and almost no two will be alike. What does this prove? In the first place, it shows that there is no uniformity of practice among operators—that each one is paddling his own little canoe the best he knows how, and that there is absolutely no uniformity in results. It also shows to the close observer that, at least to some extent, there is a difference in light quality, and that this is, in a measure, responsible.

It is to be sincerely hoped that, in the not distant future, operators will study these questions, and that, with increased knowledge of the electric arc and condensing lenses, there will be a vast improvement in the illumination of the screen. But it must be clearly understood in the beginning that this involves a good many things, since the make-up of the carbons themselves undoubtedly has a good deal to do with the quality of light produced. In this connection let it be noted that there are a number of different kinds of carbon, as will be seen by referring to page 82 of the first edition of the handbook. I do not know what experiments, if any, have been made with a view of determining whether gas retort carbon, the carbon obtained from pitch, tar, naphthaline, or coke carbon, is best suited to projection work; nor do I know what experiments, if any, have been made to determine the effect of the different binders on projection light.

It has been shown, and, I believe thoroughly demonstrated, that an addition of common salt (chlorine) to the carbons has a softening effect on the light, in that it adds yellow rays. Now it seems to me, as there is considerable value in that salt idea, if it be carried out to its logical conclusion, and a method might be found of inserting exactly the right amount of whatever agent (presumably chlorine) is necessary to overcome the harsh tone of the light. The soaking of carbons in salt water has a very decided tentency to establish a pleasing light tone under certain conditions, but it sets up other difficulties and, in some instances, rather serious difficulties, too, one of which is the needling of the carbons. I believe, however, that if carbon manufacturers experimented they could overcome this difficulty, and, in fact, I believe there is much room for improvement in projection carbons, particularly along the lines of softening the light by the addition of yellow rays.

I have been wondering if the Wizard of Orange could not be induced to do some experimenting, looking to the improvement of projection arc carbons. I do not know of anything that Mr. Edison could do which would add more to the sum of human enjoyment than to improve the effect on the screens of our moving picture theaters, and I am sure he could do this, at least to a considerable extent, by improving carbons along the lines suggested.

However, laying this phase of the matter aside, there still remains the fact that operators themselves could bring about an immense improvement by intelligent experiment and careful study of the light they are producing. I believe I am not exaggerating when I say that nine out of every ten operators, to all intents and purposes, have not done one particle of experimenting, or study, along these lines. They are just blundering along, getting the best results they can on the lines of least resistance.

I have been wondering if it would not be possible to use a color screen of a very faint tinge of yellow in the opening of the operating room wall. This may sound like a rather foolish suggestion, and possibly it is, too; still, where alternating current is used and the light has a decided bluish tint, I believe it is worth trying out, as a make-shift until some method can be found of overcoming the difficulty by placing the toning agent in the carbons themselves. The tint, of course, would have to be very slight indeed—just barely a discernible trace, sufficient to soften the bluish glare of the light on the screen.

In closing, let me say that certain kinds of metallic screen surfaces have an effect, and a very decided effect, in making for harsh illumination. This is particularly true of home-made aluminum coated-screens. They should be discarded.

From New Orleans.

New Orleans, Louisiana, contributes the following:

> In my letter, page 1064, September 6th issue, you said "inserted" a piece of asbestos board, where as my letter read "removed." On page 746 of the August 6th issue, you speak of arcs being wired in multiple. Do you approve of this? If so, why did you knock that system on page 101 of the Handbook? With reference to the series of questions which you proposed to publish in the Department, why anyone can get hold of them. If you publish them in book form and charge a certain price for the same anyone with the price could secure them. In fact, any intelligent man with the Handbook can get some idea about these different questions, which you propose to ask, since the book is reasonably clear. Suppose you publish this series of questions and charge a fixed price for same, but sell them only to those you know possess the Handbook, and are interested in going forward in the line of projection improvement. Or, if you find the expense of this too great, go ahead and publish in the Department. Would a board of examiners ask the questions in the same way you put them? If they did it would, of course, be easy for a man to learn the answers, but if they changed the manner of putting the questions it would tend to confuse the applicant and show how little he really did know. Personally, I would like to see these questions appear in some sort of book form—pocket edition preferred, but only in the hands of real operators, as you say. We know you are always ready to do your part and all real operators ought to be willing to do theirs. Commenting about shows: we had a moving picture show (?) here which gave five acts of vaudeville (?) and seven to ten reels of pictures; week days charging 5 cents and on Sunday 10 cents. Can you beat it? I don't know whether they are still giving the same amount for the money, but they are still operating. Practically all of our men who work at evening jobs do something else during the day—that is to say, hold another job at something else—in order to make a living, or, to put it another way, most night operating jobs in New Orleans are merely side issues. Of my own personal knowledge, one operator who is working from seven to ten p. m. week days, and from 5:15 to 10 on Sundays, asked a manager for more salary recently and the manager's answer was that he thought he was doing the right thing by paying $8.00, and that he never intended to pay more for an operator. Can you expect a man to put forth his best efforts under such conditions? This is one of the best reasons why projection in New Orleans is not as good as it should be.

In the first place, New Orleans, your original letter read "inserted," and not, as you say, "removed." Therefore, you are full of prunes on that particular proposition, and the error is up to you. And then, as the good methodist parson says, "secondly," there ain't no such thing as an August 6th issue, and page 746 is not in the Department at all. Guess again, brother. It is page 741 of August 16th issue you are referring to.

As to arcs being wired in multiple, the case on page 101 of the Handbook is not analogous to the one referred to on page 741 of August 16th issue, though your criticism, in a way, holds good nevertheless. I cannot say that I approve the multiple wiring scheme altogether. My objection is that you cannot burn a crater on a new trim of carbons. Aside from that, however, the Seattle scheme works perfectly, but the objection to my mind, is a very serious one indeed.

That book of questions scheme appeals to me in one way, but it does not in another. My whole idea in this series of questions was to induce operators to study, and find out the answers to the questions for themselves. It was for that reason I wanted the unions to take the matter up, because, if they had done so (two or three unions did make arrangements to handle the matter in the way I suggested) an immense amount of good might have been accomplished. To put out the questions and answers in book form, however, would not, I think, serve any good purpose, since operators would buy the book, read the questions and the answers thereto, and not know much more than they did before. There is no excellence without great labor and in order to really learn something, and come to an understanding of a subject, you must get down and dig out the knowledge with a mental pickaxe. You cannot read a question and then read the answer to it, and say that you know, for you do not. You must understand the why and wherefore of that answer, and that can only be arrived at through good, hard study and that is just exactly what I am trying to get operators to do—study. Any answer any man gets out of the Handbook, he will get because he has studied the question and learned, and that is exactly the way I want him to get it. Organized labor has not a better friend in the world than I am but I am not the kind of friend who wants to see a union succeed simply because it is a union. I want to see it succeed just like everything else worth while succeeds, and that is on its own merits. If a non-union man is really a better posted, better informed, more competent operator than a union man, and if the non-union man still wants to improve himself, while the union operator is satisfied, and sits down in complaceent laziness, proposing to depend for his increased salary simply on the knock-em-down-and-take-it-away policy, then I favor the non-union man, and you can make the most of that, my good friend.

I have decided to go ahead with the questions in the Department, but I will do so in a way which I do not think will cause any damage. At least, I shall try it. If it works out right, well and good; if it does not I can stop at any time. I simply want to do what is best for the men and the business as a whole. Any operator who copies an answer and sends it in thinking he is fooling me is simply kidding himself. It does me no harm and gets him nothing but a little second-hand glory in causing us to think he is what he is not.

As to the $8.00 a week manager, I have expressed my opinion on that proposition so often, and so plainly, that it would be useless to reiterate it at this time. Eight dollars a week is no inducement for a man to put forth his best efforts. It certainly is not. And to expect a man to work every night from 7 to 10 operating a moving picture machine, and then work during the day is outrageous. No man with good sense would expect anything of that kind.

Automatic Take-up Tension Equalizer.

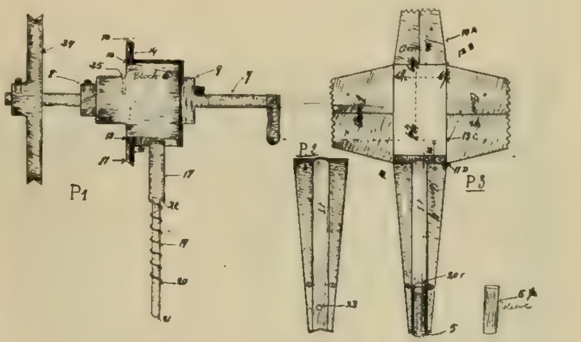
Mr. J. F. Reney, Starland Theater, Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada, sends in the following illustration and description of a take-up tension equalizer which he has invented, and which he claims gives an equal pull on the film throughout the run. The device seems to be simple enough, and I see no reason why it would not work out quite well, though as to that I would not care to express a final opinion without first having seen the device at work under ordinary operating room conditions. Friend Reney's description is as follows:



P. 3. (Part 3, I suppose Brother Reney means). Frame on which the lower magazine is fixed. Shown from the left side of the machine. P. 2. Cover for same having a semi-round hole in its length to match the same in lower arm 4-P. P. 1. Automatic take-up, the main part being a block (6) having a hole in its center for the shaft (7) bearing collars 8 and 9 and pulley 24. Under the block is fixed a plunger 17, and spiral spring 19. The size of the block must be the width of the rectangular opening: 6½ to 6½ in the frame P. 3, and its height 6¼ to 6 P. 3. These are numbers, not inches. Block 6, when in its place, should show 10 at 10A, 12 at 12B, 11 at 11D and 13 at 13C. Plunger 17, and spring 19 will be in hole 18. Cover P. 2 is screwed over. Sleeve 5½ is slipped in as per 5, and is held by screw 23. The take-up is then supported by spring 19 against shoulder 22 and the top of the sleeve 20 F. The spring must be of a well determined strength, and must not be effected, or at least very little effected, by a weight less than three pounds. The first half of the film requires a loose belt to avoid the excessive pull, after which we have a weight of about three pounds on the take-up, which must begin to compass the spring, lowering the said take-up and tightening the belt and continues to do so as the rewinding progresses. This device will allow the straight run of any quantity of films a magazine can hold. The jaws 14 and 15, P. 1, are for the purpose of covering the openings left in the frame P. 3, jaw 15 covering the bottom opening when the take-up is at rest, and jaw 14 covering the top opening while the take-up moves down. The guiding of the take-up must be made by the plunger 17 in the hole 18, and sleeve 5. The film being run, when removing it from the take-up, the spring will then be unloaded and will raise the take-up ready to start again.

Double Spot.

Mr. A. L. Vuncannon, High Point, North Carolina, has written Severy, Kansas, concerning his remedy for double spot with which Severy is troubled. He also contributes it to the department, as follows:

> When I took my present position, the lamp gave a double spot, and the manager said it had always done so. First I set the carbons as usual, and then set the lamp at as great an angle as possible. I then put an extension to the table and set the rods back about three inches, but it only really required about one-half inch farther back, or just over the end of the regular table. We use a Power's Six and Mr. Simmons told me he had written that company three times without result. My manager says I put up a good enough show for him, but, nevertheless, I know is is far from perfect. I am not certain, but think a better and larger screen would help some, as it is only 8 x 11 feet, with a 57-foot throw. I am using an Edison economizer.

To take up your last sentence first, let me say to you that the Edison economizer is a very good transformer. The probability is you do not understand it. I would recommend to your manager that he write the Edison Company for directions for adjusting their transformer. These are also given on pages 152 to 158, inclusive, of the handbook. I cannot keep on repeating well-established facts that nearly everyone is familiar with. Transformer action has been discussed to a fare-you-well and the rudimentary part of it cannot be resurrected for an isolated case. As to your remedy for double spot, I do not exactly see what pulling the lamphouse has to do with it, though the angling of the lamp might have a great deal, as I have several times pointed out. However, your experience is referred to our readers, who are, or may be in the future, troubled with double spot. If it worked with you, quite possibly it will also work with them. A better screen might improve matters, but enlarging the picture would not, since it would spread the available light over a greater area and magnify any defects there might be. The Nicholas Power Company has the reputation of replying to all correspondence. Probably the letters miscarried somewhere and somehow.

Very Good Indeed.

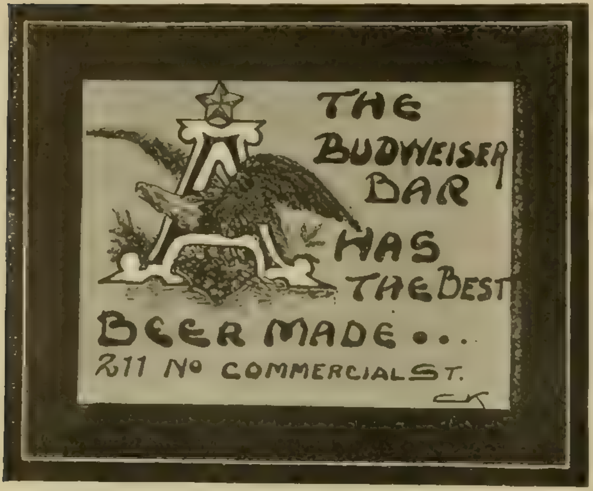
Mr. C. J. Kaho, Trinidad, Colorado, sends in a sample slide with the following letter:

> For pen and ink work on bare glass do you know of anyone who can beat this? The glass on which this was done has no sizing of any kind. The design was drawn by myself and the lettering was done by yours truly also, although the latter is not anything very extra. Later on I am going to send you one of my slides, which I call "non-breakable." It is one that you cannot break, and, it will be reasonable, cannot burn—or, at least, you won't. My present formula, however, I do not think would meet your approval. I am very sorry you were unable to visit Trinidad on your trip West.



The pen and ink design is really wonderfully good to have been done on an unsized glass. It really does not seem possible. Are you willing to swear, Brother Kaho, that you did not do a little transferring first? That would not be sizing, of course, but it would amount to about the same thing. It does not seem to me that you could possibly do ink work as good as that on raw glass. Yes, I would like to have visited Trinidad, for I know that little city very well indeed, and have been there dozens of times, but it was before there were any moving picture theaters, in that part of the world at least. Will be glad to look at the non-breakable slide when it is ready.

As To Examinations.

San Diego, California, discusses certain matters as follows:

> To my mind the argument advanced opposing the publication of the questions do not properly apply to the case. Do you personally know of an examination worthy of the name? I have had experience in two cities, viz.: Los Angeles and San Diego, and in both the questions asked by the examiners were so very simple that anyone who knew anything at all could have passed. In Los Angeles I know four Japs and Greeks who obtained licenses, none of whom would have been able to read your questions, or, for that matter, anything else in English. Operators from other cities tell of like conditions. However, in your wider experience you may have found a different brand of "examiners." The argument I advance will hardly meet with your approval: admitting that to attempt to prevent the spread of knowledge is impossible and narrow, at the same time the idea of placing this knowledge in the hands of those who might abuse its use is a question which should be given deep thought by you. Any course which tends to overcrowd any profession, or craft, is a grave, and, I may say, a fatal condition to the working members of that profession or craft, and I believe in this case they are the men whom you have so sincerely endeavored to help. On the Coast we have four men for every job, and the addition of more men will only tend to lower wages and drive out competent men. At the same time, I believe that all competent men should be given whatever inducement possible to keep them in the craft, whether they be union or non-union men, and your questions, if they reached the proper people, would benefit all. The only method that at present would meet with my approval would be to send the questions to the president of each local, with the understanding that no copies are to be made and that after proper discussion of the questions, they are to be returned to you. This would place us on our honor which I feel sure would be respected, if placed before the local on these grounds. However, this method would be sharply criticised by many, and would not reach the non-union operator. To overcome this you might state that any body of men, with proper credentials, could obtain these questions, providing they paid their share of the expense. I admit this suggestion does not meet the question squarely, and anyone who can improve it will have my sincere thanks. I make the above statement merely as an individual. In no way is my opinion intended to reflect the opinion of Local 207. In closing I will say that I believe that some method by which better projection could be obtained would benefit the operators to an extent which would surprise even you. I wrote you some days ago regarding conditions here and really expected some comment.
> By the way, Brother Metcalf has constructed the most simple and best loop setter for Edison, and possibly other machines, that I have ever seen or heard of, or ever expect to hear of. Takes five minutes to make and can be used on motor or hand driven machines. He promised to send you a description.

Well, San Diego, your letter is decidedly interesting, and I am glad to see that a good many of the men realize the importance of this proposed series of questions. Here in the East, particularly in Massachusetts, we have a pretty stiff examination, though it does not cover anywhere near the ground it ought to cover. New York City has an examination so difficult that only about one out of ten gets by. Yet the New York examination, to all intents and purposes, only covers the electrical end of things, and does not in any way show whether a man is a competent operator or not. I hardly think the method of sending the questions to the unions only would be fair, since there are thousands of small town operators who not only are not in any union, but, up to date, have been unable to get into any union, although many are competent, and some of them far more competent than many city operators who belong to the organization. I have evolved a scheme of publishing certain questions, and then publishing the best answer received, together with a roll of honor containing the names of others who send in excellent replies. After mature deliberation, I have concluded that this will not do any damage. We are today confronted with a peculiar condition. The profession of operating is overcrowded with incompetents, but there is an enormous lack of competent men who can and will deliver high class results on the screen. It is far from my intention, or my desire, to put more incompetents into the business of operating, but when it comes down to a flat choice of running the risk of adding a few more men to the already overcrowded ranks of mediocre operators, and a proposition of very largely increasing the knowledge of many thousands of operators, hence decreasing the number of incompetents, why I think you can see what my choice must be. Regardless of what certain ones may think, or imagine, I am trying to do those things which are for the best interests of the operators and managers of this and other countries, and the business as a whole. And what is more I have always tried to do this, and what is still more, I always intend to try to do this. As to the loop setter, if the brother has something of real value, let him get busy and send in a description, or, better yet, a working model. I have a Motiograph, Edison Exhibition model, Standard Edison type B and a Power's 6 head, in my office. I shall be glad to see how the brother's scheme works.

Paint.

Mr. E. W. Huhphreys, Woodstown, New Jersey, asks:

> Should the inside of an operating room made of asbestos lumber be painted? If so, what kind of paint should I use?

No paint is required. Any paint, other than lamp black and turpentine with just barely enough oil to prevent its rubbing off, is to some extent objectionable in an operating room, by reason of the fact that in case of fire the paint adds a very large amount of pungent, dense, vile-smelling smoke. Personally, while it does not make a cheerful looking room, the editor of this Department always painted the inside of his operating room with lampblack mixed with turpentine, and just a little bit of oil. I like the inside of the operating room just as dark as I can possibly get it, because it is only through this condition that a sufficiently clear view of the picture can be had to detect faint shadows.

Visible Writer.

Mr. James Slipper, San Bernardino, California, writes as follows:

> In July 12th issue, you made inquiry concerning a machine for the writing of advertisements on the screen. I am putting out a device for this purpose which works perfectly. Have been using it for two years on a 90-foot throw. Patent is applied for. The hand is not visible when writing. I can furnish any one a machine of this kind at $75.00.

What friend Slipper means is that he has a practical machine with which you can, to all intents and purposes, write directly on the screen of the theater. That is to say, you write on a slide and the actual act of writing is projected to the screen. This is a very good stunt provided the machine is practical for use in the operating room. By "practical," I mean of such nature that it will not interfere in any way with projection, and is capable of being manipulated by the ordinary operator.

Operators Are you perfectly satisfied with th results you get on the screen?

"THE ACTRESS AND HER JEWELS" (Lubin), Sept. 30.—Mae Hotely is interesting as the actress who in search of publicity connives at the theft of her jewels, only to learn later that the bogus thief has been anticipated by the real article. It is good drama; it carries a few laughs, too.

"THE CONSTABLE'S DAUGHTER" (Lubin), Sept. 30.—On the same reel is this short comedy. It will amuse.

"A DAUGHTER OF ROMANY" (Edison), Sept. 30.—This picture, made in England by the MacDermott-Nesbitt company, abounds in fine backgrounds. It is a story of a gypsy camp in the beginning, the scene shifting to an English estate. There is much to interest and to hold throughout. Charles Brabin is the producer.

"LILLIAN'S NIGHTMARE" (Patheplay), Sept. 30.—Good comedy. The story is of a girl rather impressed by a young Indian, portrayed by George Gebhardt. In a dream she elopes with her red friend and goes to the camp of the husband. Her life there is unbearable and she runs away. The portrayal is consistent and it is convincing.

"THE DESCHUTES CANYON, WASHINGTON" (Patheplay), Sept. 30.—On the same reel is this fine scenic, showing pictures taken from a train running through the canyon. One of the most interesting is the view showing 130 different layers of lava on the side of the cut.

"THE FALSE FRIEND" (Selig), Sept. 30.—A pretty story well played. There are no particularly strong situations, but the interest holds. Baby Lillian Wade has a prominent part, and she handles it with unusual skill, which is saying much.

"WHICH?" (Vitagraph), Sept. 30.—This is one of the Nash-twin comedies which are so popular, one of the essential factors in this popularity being the remarkable resemblance between the two girls, thus avoiding the dual role which these days is being overworked. Wallie Van and Louise Beaudet have the other important roles. The final scene, in which Cutey declares to the mother of the girls his affection for her, to the disappointment of the twins, will make much laughter.

"JOHN BONSALL OF THE U. S. SECRET SERVICE" (Selig), Oct. 3.—A first class detective story, possessing the necessary ingredients of mystery, crime and a satisfactory denouement. Both the scenes in the hotel and those on board the big ocean liner possess atmosphere and the suspense is properly developed as the story progresses. Roy Watson gave a good representation of the bell boy with criminal instincts, and H. A. Livingston was pleasing as the detective, though there was a little too much posing in the latter part. Alice Gordon was pleasing as the girl.

"THE CLEVER STORY" (Patheplay), October 3.—A good subject, freshly handled and containing many of the little bits of new business which help out a film story so much. The young author and artist elope and their first attempts at housekeeping furnish much humor. The animated illustrations of the author's successful story are very pleasing and there is a genuine surprise at the end, where fact and fiction are brought together in a novel way. One of the most original of recent releases and accordingly successful.

"THE TREASURE OF DESERT ISLE" (Vitagraph), October 3.—The old professor discovers a beautiful daughter of a beachcomber on an island far from civilization. He returns home and sends a young man on an expedition for the island treasure. He and his party find the girl, but do not learn that she constitutes the entire treasure until the professor arrives and tells them so. This story is extremely romantic and beautifully pictured, but it leaves much to the imagination and it struck us the ending was a little flat, for everyone on the expedition, except the young man, who, of course. gets the girl. Charles Kent and Anita Stuart play the old professor and the girl, and E. K. Lincoln appears as the young man.

"THE SCARFPIN" (Lubin), October 3.—The action in this story centers about the best man at a wedding who is infatuated with the young bride. He takes to drink as a result of this unrequited affection. Later, while intoxicated, he calls upon her and leaves the scarfpin her husband has given him in order to make the latter jealous. The principal interest comes about through his efforts to regain the pin when he comes to his senses. There is something about the situation depicted here which is not very pleasing; it is hard for the observer to sympathize with such absurd conduct. At the same time the situations in the house at night are quite dramatic and hold the attention well. But the pin could have been hidden by the wife at the request of the repentant best man.

"AND THE WATCH CAME BACK" (Kalem), October 3.—A half-reel comedy with some laughing spots in it. Jack obtains his prospective father-in-law's watch, thinking it has been stolen from him. He tries every means to get rid of it, but it insists on coming back. The denouement takes place at the police station, about the only trite situation in the film story. A pleasing number.

"HISTORIC BOSTON" (Kalem), October 3.—Excellent pictures of Old South Church, Bunker Hill Monument, Faneuil Hall, Craddock House and many other famous buildings and localities in and about Boston and its suburbs. A good historical half reel, with above.

"THE BELLE OF SISKYOU" (Essanay), October 2.—Good characters who are fresh and convincing for the most part are the prominant element in making this picture a good offering. The story is passable and, as its writer and producer have pictured it, one gets the impression of depth in it. Things are merely suggested that are not wholly opened. There are always things behind matters in real life and art that can suggest this fact and hardly help being interesting. Of course, the players deserve credit for their share of this.

"OUR NEIGHBORS" (Selig), October 2.—A splendid chance for a fine picture seems to have been let slip in this offering. The situation is of the best. We find a salesman's family and a banker's family living in adjoining houses. The rich family want to be neighborly, but the salesman's wife is bitter for some reason and repels them. It is the children of both houses that finally bring the families together. This is all within the sphere of truth and the probabilities; but the way that is taken to show how it comes about is far from likely; is not quite believable.

"A TENDER-HEARTED CROOK" (Biograph), October 2.—A burglar plays the part of matchmaker and reunites two people who had quarreled and made themselves very unhappy. The Pathe people had a good offering with a situation essentially the same as this some months ago. Yet the atmosphere of the present Biograph offering is quite different. The Pathe picture accented the comedy in it; the sex note in it has been accented in this picture; only one touch of its comedy really got over. Both pictures are good offerings. In this one the work of Claire McDowell, when she has written to her lover and decided to shoot herself, is filled with passion. Her work is only the picture's chief merit. She is truly an artist. Charles West plays her lover; Harry Carey, the burglar who, after reading her note, makes her send for him, and when he comes makes him send for the minister, played by Hector Dion. It has been well staged.

"AN AUTOCRAT OF FLAPJACK JUNCTION" (Vitagraph), October 2.—A Bunny-Finch that made the audience laugh. That audiences laugh or not is the only comment necessary on most farces. This one would not be the best choice for a church show or even a private show among people of strict ideas, but it was intended for the crowd. Written by Frank Thomas; it was produced by George D. Baker.

"THE CATTLE THIEF'S ESCAPE" (Selig), October 1.—We were entertained by this picture, more because what it showed was fresh than because it was probable. In truth, its freshness was obtained at the expense of its probability. What might have been a serious scenario has been done in the right spirit and makes a hidden comedy that is truly amusing. It's a safe picture to show even on a rainy day. The girl (Myrtle Stedman) gives the new minister, out West, a side of beef. The half breed (poor devil) kills a steer and puts the new skin under a box at the dominie's door and he is accused of being a cattle thief and strung up. But the girl sees the deed and shoots from the distance, cutting the rope. Explanations follow.

"SALVATION SAL" (Vitagraph), October 1.—This picture is not a whole success, chiefly because the players were weak in putting over the emotional side of it. There was little emotional sincerity in the pictures of the army lassies and this made the whole picture seem artificial. George Cooper, as "Red," the gangster who is sent to prison and whom Sal gets out in time to see him die of consumption, is a clearly drawn type. The Governor, played by Charles Bennett, with the District Attorney (Mr. Haskin), and one or two others in lesser roles, also are commendable, but the situation does not impress too strongly. Robert Thornby produced it from the script of W. Hanson Durham.

"MR. TOOT'S TOOTH" (Edison), October 1.—A farce by Arthur Houseman that pleased the audience. We think that much more could have been gotten out of it. It exists for the unexpected way in which Toots gets rid of the offending molar. Every time he got near the dentist's it got better temporarily. Everybody advised him with no good results until the office force got the tooth tied to a string with a heavy book at the other end. Toots didn't dare have the book thrown out of the window, but, getting mad, throws it at the boys with a happy result. We can say that it made the spectators laugh. The subtitles are a help to it.

"DAMASCUS AND THE RUINS OF BAALBEC" (Edison), October 1.—On the same reel with the foregoing harmless farce is this series of views. Surely it is a notable thing to have good pictures of Damascus and of Baalbec, with its grand old relics of the times when the Emperors of Rome built temples in Asia Minor. Our only criticism is that there might have been much more of it without satisfying our interest. The camera work is commendable.

"A SUCCESSFUL FAILURE" (Essanay), October 1.—The people laughed over this farce on a very rainy day here in New York. It is lively in parts, but most of it is made up of stock situations and a quarter of it is views of a pretty park through which first one nephew of a rich man takes a girl walking, and then his brother takes her riding in a motor car. It is the uncle that marries her. But he gives them each a thousand dollars, so theirs is a successful failure.

"OXYGEN" (Patheplay), October 1.—Those who haven't studied chemistry—and they have missed a good deal—will get instruction with entertainment from this offering. It is elementary, just what is fitted for general audiences, and it is very commendable.

"ALONG THE PADAS RIVER IN BORNEO" (Patheplay), October 1.—On the same reel with Oxygen is this clearly photographed and beautifully tinted series of views of tropical scenery. Pictures of wildly flowing water are always acceptable, but, whether in Babylon or Borneo, as far as the water goes, pictures of them look alike. More of scenery along the banks of the Padas with a little less of the rapids might have been even more acceptable. These two on one reel make a good offering.

"FOR HER BROTHER'S SAKE" (Lubin), October 4.—A film story of somewhat conventional type, in which the sister goes west, falls in love with the ranch foreman and marries him. Later the brother comes West and the husband becomes jealous, not understanding the relationship. This goes over familiar ground and never seems particularly convincing, as the wife would naturally tell her husband of the brother's presence, no matter how much of a black sheep he might be. The photography is very clear and the story well enough enacted.

"THE STRUGGLE" (Essanay), October 4.—A Western offering with G. M. Anderson, Marguerite Clayton and Frederick Church in the leading roles. Dr. Sharp introduces his brother to his sweetheart. The brother proceeds to call upon her secretly, but the young physician discovers this and there follows an exciting, though very unbrotherly, warfare. Shots are exchanged in the woods. The doctor wounds his brother, probes for the bullet with a pocket knife, carries him home and later restores him to health. An average offering, with some brisk action running through it.

THE RAILROAD INSPECTOR'S PERIL" (Kalem), October 4.—Here is a highly romantic railroad story, containing many ridiculous features and yet on the whole making good. Miriam Cooper does some daring feats in the part of Jane, riding on top of moving box cars with a revolver in her hand; later both she and Bad Bill jump from the moving freight train into a stream. The hero is represented as guarding valuable freight, the nature of which is not indicated; his white trousers and boiled shirt did not comport with the nature of his job very well. A story by no means uninteresting, though it does seem as though its numerous shortcomings might easily have been avoided.

"THE CONTENTS OF THE SUITCASE" (Edison), October 4.—An exchange of suitcases on a passenger train brings out the action in this interesting story. The hero is held up by a gang of moonshiners, who think they have made a great haul when a bunch of greenbacks is found in the suitcase. The real owner of the suitcase later appears and is apprehended for having counterfeit money in his possession. The story is not at all probable, but the outdoor scenes and pleasing personality of the players help out the plot. Bliss Milford, Richard Neill and Augustus Phillips have the leading roles.

"THE CHIEFTAIN'S SONS" (Biograph), October 4.—This picture has splendid atmosphere and fairly takes one back to the days when Indians roamed the land. The scenes are beautifully portrayed, though one or two of them seemed a little dark. The story concerns an Indian chief, who dies early in the story. There is much underhanded work and two intermixed love affairs, the action being just a little obscure in places. But on the whole this production, because of its photographic beauty and fidelity to Indian traditions, will please most observers.

"A WALL STREET WAIL" (Patheplay), October 4.—Animated drawings of an exceptionally humorous character, purporting to illustrate a fable of high finance. The drawings get many laughs from observers and make a decidedly interesting half reel.

"RIDING THE FLUME" (Patheplay), October 4.—Pictures of a vast power enterprise at Electron, Washington. Here a railroad is built over a flume 10 miles long. Views of Spokane Falls conclude the half reel, which appears with above, and is well worth seeing.

"THINGS JAPANESE" (Melies), October 2.—This is probably one of the most authoritative and valuable pictures that have been taken of things Japanese. It will be noticed and liked by all kinds of people, especially for its human interest—in which it resembles a former picture of the Melies Company of Japanese cooking. In photography it is most perfect. There are two parts of it. The first, which is devoted to children and their games, includes school children leaving their teacher, each with a polite bow; games, dances, etc. The second part, on occupations of the common people, includes basket making, cobbling, ropemaking, sawyers at work, and low tide fishermen.

"HIS SECRET" (Biograph), October 6.—His secret was that he had entered the house to steal, but finding his wife in there tending a little girl who had had an accident, he slipped out and she never knew. They were a couple much in need of money, but the wife, by her kindness, got a job for both, so he did not need to steal after the incident. The picture fails to convince or be very interesting. It has its good moments, of which five little girl players in it furnish a good share by their natural work.

"A SHORT LIFE AND A MERRY ONE" (Edison), October 6.—A fantastic farce produced by Charles France. An imp makes a tramp change places with a scarecrow who is permitted to roam about changing other scarecrows into living beings and having merry times with them so long as he keeps the magic wand in his hand. It is a clever piece of work for the most part and is well acted, fresh enough to please and will make a good light offering.

"THE COUNTERFEITER'S FATE" (Lubin), October 6.—The plot of this picture is a bit more complicated than usual in moonshiner or counterfeiter melodramas, with the revenue man or detective making quick love to the old man's daughter, but it is essentially like the others. And it is more artificial than usual with pictures by Romaine Fielding, who also plays the villain with not quite his usual feeling for character. Yet, just before the climax is reached, there are two groups of scenes that promise to be effective. There is snappy work in both, but neither really pans out.

"THE END OF THE RUN" (Kalem), October 6.—Not quite up to the best of the Kalem railroad stories; the situation lacks clear-cut, effective [illegible], which has not been made dramatic. The sweetheart's old father is a railroad engine driver and becomes a doddering old man, though he still holds his place. The hero refuses to pass an examination for promotion, because he must stay with the old man and keep him straight, since he can no longer see signals. In the end, he is found out and laid off and the young people marry. There is not enough substance to this to make the best picture. That young engineer, if caught smoking a cigarette on duty, would have been fired.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 56" (October 6).—There are a number of interesting items, but none of paramount importance. It is nevertheless an excellent offering, as usual.

"BIRDS OF THE SOUTHERN SEA COAST" (Edison), October 6.—On the same reel with the farce is this scenic and natural history picture, for it partakes of both natures. There is beautiful photography in it and striking backgrounds full of interest, with the birds, terns, hoerns, etc., as inhabitants.

Licensed Specials.

"WHY GIRLS LEAVE HOME" (Edison), October 3.—A splendid revival of this well-remembered success of former days. There is the same minister and his household who go to see the play, "Why Girls Leave Home." The stage and the audience are shown in turn, and as the burlesque proceeds the scenes become very funny and make the house rock with laughter. The boy, Ikey, falls from the gallery, and all of the old scenes are brought out, together with much new business. A successful comedy offering.

"THE DEPTH OF HATE" (Patheplay), Oct. 2.—The reason why this offering fails to impress one deeply, aside from the qualities that producer and players have given to it, is that the foundations for the hatred are not adequate, are, in fact, insane. The picture has some moments that are impressive, as, for instance, the death of the lodgekeeper's daughter; but this is followed by a moment that fails to bolster it with sincere emotion. One will also not be wholly satisfied with the fact that the daughter of the lodgekeeper should lose her sweetheart to the mistress of the house and that, in this same picture, the young, widowed mother and her daughter should be rivals for this same man. As for the acting, the work of the player who takes the unhappy girl's role rises far above the work of the others in the cast. The photography and the stage management are of a high order.

"UNDER THE DAISIES" (Vitagraph), Sept. 27.—For this two-part picture Mrs. Owen Bronson has written a script of sustained pathos. Van Dyke Brooke is the producer; and, like all of his work, this is carefully executed. The staging of the scene of the play is unusually effective. The frame is of the stage; the background is of an open field. Norma Talmadge, Leo Delaney and Harry Northrup have the leads. The interpretation of each is restrained and yet strong.

"MISGOTTEN GAINS" (Cines), Sept. 30.—There is nothing new in this two-part story, but owing to its skillful treatment it makes an interesting release. The theme is of a father who refuses to sanction the marriage of a daughter with a naval officer; on the other hand, he insists upon her union with a noble who proves to be bogus and whose arrest is effected at the last minute before the ceremony. The acting, settings and photography are good.

"THE BATTLE OF FORT LARAMIE" (Kalem), October 1.—A typical Indian melodrama in two parts; one makes a very fair release. It has action and gets down to business early and then there is something doing all the time: Dust of Indians riding on the war path, battle smoke and shooting, burning and the love story on which these things are threaded. It is well staged in good backgrounds; the acting is so so; the photography is clear.

"THE SPECIAL OFFICER" (Lubin), Oct. 2.—A two-part melodrama that has been beautifully photographed. It has action and keeps telling a story so that the spectator is continuously interested; but he never is deeply under the spell of the situations, never for a moment is fooled into thinking that he is looking at real life. The photography and the staging are its best things. The author, Edwin Barbour, shows a knowledge of what is required in writing a melodrama and his script was produced by L. B. Carlton.

"TONY, THE FIDDLER" (Essanay), October 3.—Fine photography and picturesque settings are the chief attractions in this two-reel number. As a one-reel subject this would have been much stronger, the action being somewhat slow for this type of story. The Western atmosphere is not quite convincing and Big Bill's costume was scarcely fitting for that of a bandit in the days of stage coaches. Francis X. Bushman appeared as Tony, whose violin music lulled the bandit to sleep. He captures Big Bill and wins the reward, but does not get the girl, which gives a rather pathetic touch to the close.

"THE SILVER SKULL" (Vitagraph), October 4.—This two-reel number contains a pleasing blend of mystery, love and adventure. James Oliver Curwood is author of the scenario and Maurice Costello, Mary Charleson and an actor named Raymond play the leads. The latter gave a particularly good representation of Lawlor, the cringing villain of the piece. L. Rogers Lytton, who plays first mate, holds the key to the mystery, which is graphically explained at the close of the second reel. The story is entertaining throughout, but the photography was very dark and foggy in places.

"THE CONSCIENCE FUND" (Selig), October 6.—Another instalment of the "Croesus Club" or "The Man in the Street" series. It is in two parts and tells a rather unconvincing story of an unusual brother and sister who find that their father, a tobacco man, has been defrauding Uncle Sam of revenue. They leave the house. One becomes the man in the street, the other a nun; and several times during the story these two demand that the old man give the Treasury Department all of his fortune. When he dies, they turn it all over to Washington. There were people in the audience who watched it with interest, but there is little in the action that has been made real. It is hardly a true feature offering.

Independent.

"A PITFALL OF THE INSTALLMENT PLAN" (American), October 6.—A commendable offering in certain respects, but one that is weak in others. It is a story well worth seeing, for the reason that it contains new features of interest, notably where it shows the manner in which grafting may be done by dishonest workmen, such as the thieving foreman who steals the cement. The wife's arrest was undoubtedly an exaggerated situation, though it will pass as part of the story. The production lacks something of force and conviction, but it is new and different.

"THE BLACK SHEEP" (Broncho), October 22.—An old fashioned sort of plot, in which the wild young fellow who cannot control his temper or his appetite for liquor turns out well in the end. There are some fine scenic effects in the first reel. Jim, the black sheep, succeeds in getting hold of the observer's interest, and in spite of the conventional nature of the plot, the story is well sustained. An attack on the stage coach by the Indians gives Jim his chance to save the girl and redeem himself. A reproduction of about ordinary merit.

"ONCE UPON A TIME" (Reliance), October 8.—A fairy story, written by Ethel Parsons. This catches the spirit of imaginative childhood, and presents a series of pretty pictures to the eye. The story did not begin very clearly, but later gained interest. A release that will be most enjoyed by children, though older people will like it also.

"THE HERITAGE" (Majestic), October 7.—This film touches rather closely to the subject of eugenics, but does so in a delicate, properly restrained manner. The girl and her mother see a crippled child on the streets. The mother explains that it is a case of "sins of the fathers." Later the girl learns that her lover has lived a fast life during his early career and for this reason refuses to accept him. This subject, hardly to be classed as mere entertainment, is handled in an inoffensive, thoughtful manner, and, no doubt, will convey the moral intended.

"THE ICEMAN'S REVENGE" (Majestic), October 11.—A comedy of considerable interest in which the iceman and the policeman are rivals for the hand of the hired girl. She at first prefers the policeman, but later the iceman proves to be her real hero. The scenes at the ball were most amusing. Rather pleasing entertainment of a light sort.

"THE RUBE BOSS" (Apollo), October 5.—A film story featuring Fred Mace and his assistant, Tiny Bud Duncan. Mace presides over his small town as mayor, judge, undertaker, real estate agent and in other capacities. He also likes to drink, and the town has been voted dry. This leads to complications of a quite amusing nature. A real house is consumed by fire and the burlesque has numerous laughing moments.

"THE END OF BLACK BART" (American), October 16.—A clean-cut out-of-doors comedy, featuring Ed. Coxen and Winifred Greenwood, who, by the way, are coming up very well in recent releases. As members of a stranded theatrical troupe they are forced to tramp through the woods at night. They come across a badly wanted bandit and bring him to justice, winning a substantial reward. The pictures are splendidly taken and the story on the whole is very entertaining.

"THE MAKING OF A WOMAN" (American), October 16.—This story gets out of the rut of certain Western releases. The butterfly wife, lost in the woods, comes to the home of the outlaw, whose child is sick. He is in despair because she can do nothing for the child and sends her away from his door. Later she returns, through fear of coyotes, and nurses the child through its illness. Some of the scenes are jerky, but the story is a good one and holds the attention.

"MAKING PIG IRON" (American), October 13.—A half-reel industrial offering, giving some very instructive views of the way pig iron is handled. The loading magnet, blast furnace, ladles, troughs, etc., were shown in active operation.

"COURAGE OF SORTS" (American), October 13.—A ghost story, in which the prospective son-in-law agrees to stay in the haunted house. The girl's father plays ghost, but the tables are turned on him speedily, and in an amusing manner. On same reel with above.

"CROOKS AND CREDULOUS" (American), October 4.—An interesting business offering, in which a young man discovers he is connected with a swindling concern. He resigns, goes to the country and meets the daughter of one of his victims. Later he pays off all of the company's indebtedness through his own efforts. This is not a new plot, but it serves to make an interesting film.

"TAMING A COWBOY" (American), October 9.—A typical ranch story, acted with more than ordinary dash and go. In fact, there seemed a little too much ginger to it in places, but the story is not complicated. Bashful Bob thinks the girl's doctor friend is her sweetheart, but she turns out to be a lady doctor and, of course, Bob is happy. Cattle rustlers appear in the story and furnish much of the action.

"THE BADGE OF HONOR" (American), October 2.—A Western offering, featuring Warren Kerrigan and Jack Richardson, one as deputy sheriff and the other as a stage-robbing outlaw. The story, which contains a love element, is quite conventional. The photography was cloudy in places.

"THE BULLY" (Kay-Bee), October 10.—An old-fashioned "school" story, in which the bully succeeds in getting the faithful old man teacher discharged. He tries to create trouble for the girl teacher, but is soundly whipped by the hero, who, of course, weds the teacher. This story is agreeable and entertaining, though not very new.

"SCHNITZ THE TAILOR" (Keystone), October 9.—A helter-skelter offering of the familiar Keystone type, in which Ford Sterling appears as a ladies' tailor. In the later scenes there appear the hose, the water tank, the police force, some revolvers and other fun-making accessories. High diving is the closing feature. Interesting nonsense, free from offense.

"A MIXUP IN PEDIGREES" (Majestic), October 5.—Muriel's father begins an investigation of the family trees of her two lovers, Brown and Revere. One of them is descended from a royal family and the other the son of a farmer who was hanged for stealing hogs. The stenographer mixes up the names and an amusing situation results. There is considerable originality in this.

"THE BUFFER" (Reliance), October 6.—A comedy reel, written by Charles Dickson, the author himself enacting the principal role. As relative of the young married man he brings dissension between the honeymooners, and afterward restores peace. The film moves along in a breezy manner and possesses a pleasing flavor of originality, entertaining comedy.

"ACROSS THE ALLEY" (Keystone), October 6.—Two trained Boston bull terriers provide some laughs in this half reel. The child seeks refuge in the dog kennel and not all the entire Keystone police force could succeed in getting it away from its protectors. Some amusement in this.

"THE ABALONE INDUSTRY" (Keystone), October 6.—Interesting and instructive views of the abalone fields, where the valuable shell fish are pried loose from their rocks and manufactured into ornaments. On same reel with above. A good number.

"A GIRL WORTH WHILE" (Thanhouser), October 10.—This is the familiar story of business life in which the girl rushes to the meeting of the board of directors with the proxy of the man she loves. She succeeds in saving his position as president of the company. James Cruze and Mignon Anderson have the leads. The scenes seemed a little confused at times, but the photography was clear and appealing.

"LOUIE, THE LIFE SAVER" (Thanhouser), October 7.—Harry Benham appears in this as a life guard at the beach. Flo LaBadie plays the part of the girl. She is contemptuous of his attentions until she gets out in deep water and he is called upon to save her life. The usual marriage does not follow, however, as Louie merely dreams that part of the story. A rather pleasing offering.

"THE BRUTE" (Frontier), October 18.—A Western drama in which a very bad husband, the "brute," in attempting to kidnap a pretty senorita, gets himself into a precarious situation from which he emerges in the end, a better and a wiser man.

"CURING THE DOCTOR" (Frontier), October 16.—In this comedy drama, which begins in the East and afterwards transfers its scene of action to the West, two young doctors appear as rivals for a girl, and one of them manages to persuade the other to go West for his health by convincing him that he has tuberculosis.

"HIS RICH UNCLE" (Crystal), October 28.—Pearl White and Chester Barnett play the leads in this interesting little comedy.

"THE GAME THAT FAILED" (Crystal), October 28.—A broad farce in which "maw" a suffragette, gives up her lecture tour when "paw" plays sick. It shares the reel with the above.

"THE BRIGAND" (Nestor-Ambrósio), October 20.—This drama of Italian banditti will win friends for its interesting settings and the pleasing presentation of the principal parts, those of the sister who feels constrained to give up her lover because her brother is an outlaw, of the bandit, the brother and the magistrate who pardons the outlaw.

"DOLLY'S STRATAGEM" (Gaumont), October 21.—Rather an interesting drama. The story is of a father who did not like the young man selected by his daughter. The father even says if the young man comes around he will shoot him. To impress this fact on the mind of the daughter he loads a rifle in her presence. Later on, when the two lovers are near the house and in plain view of it, the father shoots at the trespasser. The daughter falls. She does not want a doctor; she does want a clergyman. When the latter arrives she insists on a marriage. After the ceermony is performed she recovers and shows her father the bullet which she had carefully extracted from the cartridge just after the weapon was loaded. Everybody is happy.

"THE ANARCHIST" (Imp), October 23.—In this picture King Baggot and Leah Baird have the leads. The production was made in Paris under the direction of Herbert Brenon, and throughout the whole story bears the impress of its maker. Mr. Baggot's work is of marked strength. Leah Baird, in the role of the sweetheart of the anarchist, gives an interpretation that will appeal to all. The rival of the anarchist is deserving of praise for good work. So also are the gendarmes, especially the chief, who, by the way, are gendarmes and not actors. There is a child in the picture who will win all hearts. She played her part with the skill of a veteran. Heart interest is established right at the beginning of the picture and is maintained throughout; and there are many situations of strong suspense. The climax is one that will grip. The rival of the anarchist has notified the police of his whereabouts, and they are pounding at the door of the cellar where he makes bombs. His sweetheart has warned him. With a bomb in his hand he awaits the breaking in of the door. He hears the faint notes of a toy horn. It is blown by the little girl to whom he has just given the instrument. Flashes show the child sitting on the floor above playing with two kittens. The hand of the anarchist drops; the police enter and make him prisoner. The picture was shown without titles; none was needed.

Independent Specials.

"THE TWO SPIES" (Gaumont), Oct. 18. This is a story written around scenes taken during the Balkan war. There are good features in the course of the two reels. One of the best is the climb across the top of the moving train running on rails paralleling a fine tree-bordered highway. The pursuit of one mounted man by another was a bit drawn-out. Many shots were fired from the pistols, but the weapons were not reloaded. The title of the picture is unfortunate. The men being in full uniform naturally could not be spies. The film will go over easily, however, by reason of its spectacular qualities.

"FATHER JOHN; OR, THE RAGPICKER OF PARIS" (World's Special Films Corporation).—A special and feature offering in three parts from the novel by Felix Pyat. We find it a commendable picture. The story is very fair and the leading character in it, Father John, will make a strong appeal. Its main theme is the love story of his adopted daughter and, in quality, it reminds one of Eugene Sue's "The Mysteries of Paris," but it is not on so big a scale. It is elaborate, yet clear enough and keeps the mind decidedly interested, so much so that it is with pleasant surprise that, at the end, we find it taking up threads that we had forgotten and rounding out its [illegible]. The ragpicker, at the opening, sees a [illegible] character kill and rob a bank messenger and because he is too drunk to save him he adopts the man's daughter, who grows up to be a very pretty girl and [illegible] dressmaking for the daughter of a rich banker. The rag man doesn't know that the banker is the criminal, but we are let into the secret. He is soon in trouble and wants his daughter to marry a rich young man who later sees and falls in love with the ragpicker's daughter. The banker's daughter has made a secret marriage and has had a child, which is the center of the struggle between the banker's evil ambition and what may be termed the girl's good angel over the desirable youth. Many interesting characters are introduced. The playing is, especially in the ragpicker and his daughter and in the rich, evil banker, full of distinction. The staging is very good.

"THE PLOT AGAINST THE GOVERNOR" (Thanhouser), October 7.—Numerous incidents and photographic features combine to make this a release somewhat out of the ordinary. In the story, which is one of politics, James Cruze plays the part of governor. He pardons a young convict, who had been falsely imprisoned. The first reel sets forth this much in an entertaining way. In the second reel Cruze impersonates both the governor and his cousin Henry. The latter responds to the decoy note and goes to the house of the adventuress. The double exposure photography is cleverly handled and adds piquancy to the story. The offering may safely be classed as one of decided interest.

"A ROMANCE OF ERIN" (Domino), October 16.—A two-reel subject, written by W. H. Clifford. The scenes are laid in Ireland, as may be judged by the title, and some very attractive settings are shown along the seashore. The story follows in the steps of former productions of this sort, the hero, Michael, being saved from hanging at the last moment by the young wife, to whom Pat has confessed his crime. Pat's dream was indeed a vivid one and the scenes of the second reel were quite strongly presented.

"THE SHE WOLF" (Bison), October 21.—In this three-reel number Grace Cunard demonstrates considerable ability as a scenario writer and an actress. The chief drawback of this particular production is that it depicts too faithfully the sordid, seamy side of life, unrelieved by lighter touches. The She Wolf is well named. She is untrue to her blind husband and afterward becomes a woman of the underworld. They meet later in a Western mining camp, when the husband's sight has been partially restored. He locks her in an abandoned shaft, where she dies. The close of the picture is sensational and as a whole it leaves a rather unpleasant feeling with the observer.

"THE REFORMATION OF CALLIOPE" (Eclair), November 5.—This nicely worked out two-reel production is based on a short story by O. Henry. Calliope is a bad man who gets to be worse, until he begins shooting people too wantonly, when the sheriff of a Western county and his deputy start after him to run him down and kill him. They meet with him at a railway station in which he and the sheriff have a gun fight, interrupted by the sudden appearance of Calliope's mother, who has come from the East to see him. She thinks he is a good man, and in order to keep her faith in him whole, the sheriff and Calliope call off their fight. Afterward Calliope reforms and shows his good will to remain good by capturing some bank robbers. The film shows good material throughout. It makes a desirable offering.

"AT THE WHEEL" (Great Northern).—A story of a woman and three men. The fact that the woman was drowned probably accounts for the absence of the fourth man in the case. In other words, the woman is without a redeeming feature—one utterly without morals; she takes on a new love as lightly as she lays off the old. The story will have interest for many. It is well played, much of the action takes place on board a steamship, and the whole is finely photographed. There is one scene near the end that particularly stands out as an effective setting. This is where the photographer is stationed in the shade and takes in the party on the other side of the veil of foliage. The drowning of the occupants of the motor boat might have been more convincing had the rescuing craft been kept at a greater distance just prior to the sinking of the boat. The picture is in three reels.

"FOR THE HEART OF A PRINCESS" (Warner's Features).—No exhibitor who takes this extremely pretty picture will feel ashamed of it for his patrons' sake or be sorry in any way. It tells a story from the Arabian Nights, one of the cleanest and sweetest of them all, and was produced by H. C. Mathews, to whom, with the good help of his camera man, all the credit for the offering's charm we believe is due. That it is naturally acted is true; but the leading players do not monopolize the good things in it. The fact is that it is marvelously illustrative; so much so, that if a painter could put on canvas Mr. Mathews' galaxy of scenes and keep all their grace and animation—a thing art is always striving to do—he would make a fine reputation. The truest, most Oriental things in it do not even come from the leading players, but from the special players—that dancing girl in the opening scene, that soothsayer who weaves magic with his arms over the smoking caldron—they and their kind made the picture what it is; they and the sets and Oriental backgrounds. There are a few discordant notes in the three reels; but they are very few. That dragging off of the slave girl from the marketplace was done as awkwardly as possible. Some "shark" on Oriental architecture may find "breaks" in the backgrounds; but we saw none. The picture delighted us entirely; we think it lovely. Mr. Mathews more often does good work than not.

"IN THE WATCHES OF THE NIGHT" (Warner's Features).—This three-act picture features Marion Leonard, and its object is to show what a woman will do to save the good name of her husband and the father of her child. She could not save his honor; he had ruined that; but she labors strenuously and, in a way, heroically to keep it from being known that he was a thief and had committed suicide. To do this entailed carrying his body out to the highway where it might be found so as to suggest that he had been robbed and murdered; and it entailed the setting of the office where he worked on fire to cover evidences of his theft. All this sensational business has been done regardless of expense, and convincingly; but the heart of the story, its situation, is far from convincing. Marion Leonard fails to reach the height of her possibilities in it, and fails to make its emotions seem sincere. It is very well photographed.

Colonial Theatre, Rochester, N. Y.

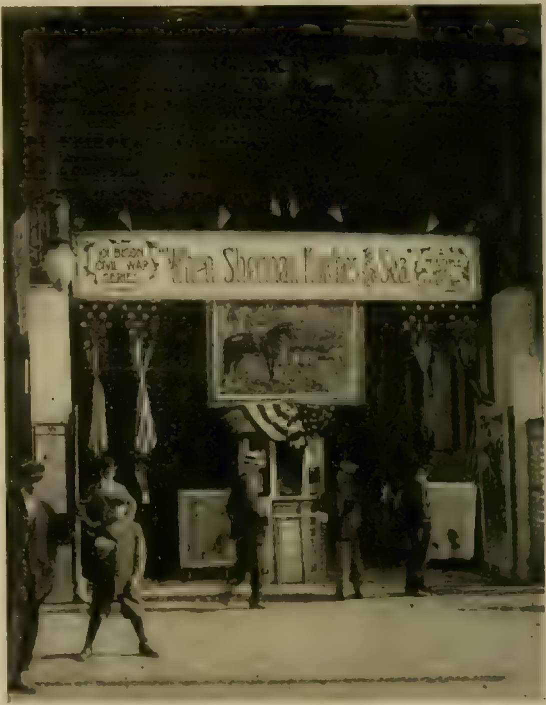
The Colonial, of Rochester, is one of those steady going theaters that never seem to close. It was built more for utility and comfort than for beauty and has withstood all the varying troubles that focus themselves upon picture houses in particular. Its resident manager is A. N. Wolff, a very popular man, and who was recently elected president of the New York State Branch of the M. P. E. L. of A. Recently we requested him to send in a photograph of himself and his theater with some data concerning both, and after looking over his reply we think it best to let him tell his story in his own words, which follow:

A. N. Wolf.

"So far as my theater is concerned, will say that it is rated as a first class house, not the best from an artistic point of view, but as good as any in the state, so far as location is concerned, and the class of people which are my patrons; they include the best in the city. The house is situated on Main Street, and is considered the best location in the city, in the heart of the retail section, and in the theater district.

"I am using four first run pictures every day, but am sorry to say that the admission is only five cents, as Rochester has not gone forward as other cities have so far as price of admission is concerned. I am a firm believer in the ten-cent admission. Any program of four reels of current pictures, properly projected, in a good modern theater, which complies with all the laws, both state and local, that has clean and wholesome atmosphere in every sense of the word, properly conducted, catering to women and children for five cents is almost unbearable, and we hope soon to correct this matter.



Entrance to Colonial Theater, Rochester, N. Y.

"So far as my new office is concerned I have not much to say for the present, except that I do not believe in disorganization and that all of the troubles and misunderstandings could be better remedied by other methods, and proper procedure, and the League remain as it was in the beginning. I believe more good can be accomplished by creating more friends than fighting friends.

OUR friend herewith reproduced is John M. Nickolaus, superintendent of the Nestor Film Co. factory, in Bayonne, N. J. There is no doubt but what Nickolaus is as competent as any in the business today, having done practically nothing else for a livelihood since the beginning of his business experience but work in and around "the dark room." When the illustrated song slide was in favor with the exhibitor, our friend was general manager of the DeWitt C. Wheeler organization, and bossed the entire job from the camera to the filled orders. Being one of those who recognized the wonderful future the motion picture held for an early entrant, Nickolaus applied for and received a dark room position with the Nestor Film Co., and accompanied them to the coast. So good was the results of his efforts in behalf of the Nestor product that he was promoted to the position he now holds, and bids fare to retain it for some time to come.

Met Mr. J. M. Boggs, from Houston, Texas, in the office of the Whyte-Whitman Co. last week, and I understand that he purchased one of those exhibitor's compact marvel outfits, including camera, tripod, etc.

While in Chicago last week, I had the pleasure of dropping in on the film representatives of the Windy City who stirred things up here during convention week and had such a good time. In fact some of them are still talking of "past performances." Everyone of them was hard at work. In the offices of the Geo. Kleine Co. were Frank Hough and Omar Doud, both working as though that were their last day. Doud had about twelve inches of paper on his desk, and was willing to bet that had he four sets of arms and three minds, all healthy and in working order, he could keep things up to date so you wouldn't think he had a thing to do.

Frank Hough acquainted me with the sad fact that only a week previous to my visit he journeyed East to bury his father, of which I was sorry to learn, and I am sure that everybody else is, too; for Frank is such an awful good sort of chap.

I also met George K. Spoor, G. M. Anderson (Broncho Billy), and V. R. Day, of the Essanay Co. After the usual "glad to meet you again, no thank you, no more for me," Day introduced me to the Hamilton Club, which made my stay in Chicago very pleasant. Thursday, September 25th, was Day's birthday and I was invited to enjoy the blowout, I won't say any more about it than this. We sure did have some time.

My very good friend Sam VanRonkel was very much there, too, and it is safe to say that his "Hudson" consumed more gasoline last week than it has been in the habit of doing for a long while. The car has not been doing night duty for quite a while, but it did not forget the stops. Neither did it forget to take us all home. I. VanRonkel, manager of the American branch of the General Film Co., and a brother to Sam, arranged a little party. Oh, that's some place to go to.

I found Don Meaney out at the Essanay plant, and like the rest of them was very busy answering questions here and there and making frequent trips down to the studio, but Saturday night found him free, and with the others helped make the evening an enjoyable one.

I stopped off at Lima, Ohio, and met Mr. J. Rus. Smith, who, with Mr. L. H. Cunningham, owns the Star Theater and the Faurot Opera House. The former, a 338 seat house, is managed by Mr. Smith, and in spite of its size does a tremendous business. Two Power No. 6 machines project a licensed program on a Radium Gold Fibre Screen, which is so good that the people always come back for more. The Faurot Opera House is under the management of Mr. Cunningham, who uses the same means of projection but swears by the Universal program. He plays to a seating capacity of 1,200, and his entertainment consists of vaudeville and pictures. Both houses have their own electric plant for generating light and current, and in each theater you will find a complete Foos Gas Engine outfit. One of the first things that Mr. Smith was to proudly exhibit a complete file of the Moving Picture World.

"The Beggar's Secret"

Pleasing Acting Makes a Recent Union Feature Picture a Good Offering.

By H. C. Judson.

THERE is a marked and interesting difference between the impression given by melodramas of French origin and those of English or American make. It is very hard to put one's finger on just what the difference is; but, to pick out situation, the French seem fond of having the heroine separated from her parents in childhood and, later, having her get work in her father's great store or factory, or in her mother's dressmaking establishment. The latter is what we find in this three-part production. It is a good situation, full of possibilities that have been well utilized and here it gives a graceful and logical means of solving the difficulties that the action has piled on top of the principal characters. The picture is notable for the distinctive acting of many of the players, for the clear life-like photography and the careful staging that has kept the scenes in convincing atmosphere throughout.

There is one little scene, a perfect gem of naturalness and the sincerity that makes one forget he is looking at a picture, and it stands out in the reviewer's mind like a bit of observed life. The heroine is in a hospital (worry and lack of food has at length laid her low), and there she has met a friend, a young dressmaker of the shop of her mother, lost many years ago. She doesn't even know that she has a mother now and is telling her new friend her sad life story and showing her a locket with its bit of hair. To begin with, the scene is perfectly photographed. The girl is half reclining on her cot and the friend is sitting beside her, and the beauty of the scene comes from the faces at the changing of the romance of the story. It is one of those pictures that reflect much more than we can say in words. And, in the three reels, there are many other scenes almost as intense in their feeling and almost as beautifully acted. On the other hand, one or two scenes fail to make their whole meaning clear and one of these is a very important scene at the opening of the picture.

In this scene the man is shown coming home late and is berated by his wife, who then weeps over the cradle in which lies the baby, soon to be stolen, who is to grow up into the heroine. The man, father of the baby, because of his berating, runs away and becomes the blind beggar who helps the heroine, later, when she has grown up and has been left to her own resources; but, until the end, neither father nor daughter know each other. In the meanwhile, the mother has become a famous dressmaker, and near the end, finding a poor girl in the hospital, charitably gives her a job, to find a few weeks later, that she is her own daughter.

Of the characters, the center of interest naturally falls on the heroine and the unconstrained, human acting of the young woman who takes the role, keeps both attention and sympathy fast there. But, as characters, the old blind beggar will most be remembered and that for the sunny good nature of the man. The mother, too, carries her part well and the others group themselves around these. On this account, chiefly the picture can safely be counted a success especially as it has other good points that we have mentioned.

JOE BRANDT, who is now on the other side of the water telling the Europeans how good Universal films are, writes in from Berlin and incloses photographs of William E. Shay and Leah Baird, who are playing leads in Herbert Brenon's Imp Company. Mr. Brandt admits that he has been very busy since he landed on foreign shores. Come to think of it, all these film fellows when abroad tell the same story if they manage to find time to write at all. However, this is quite naturally to be expected. Mr. Brandt says that, in an advertising way, conditions are radically different in Germany from what he has been accustomed to in the United States. Business men are conservative, methodical and not easily induced to depart from long-established ways. However, the German Universal Weekly will break out about October 15. Mr. Brandt says the initial number will not be as pretentious as he would like to have it, but will be in line with the program he has mapped out—it will serve to "start something."

William E. Shay.

The photographs of Mr. Shay and Miss Baird were taken in the Zoological Gardens in Berlin. Mr. Brenon was putting on a comedy at the time. The Imp director speaks little German, but he managed to find a park attendant who knew something about French. To the latter Mr. Brenon gave his instructions in French. These were conveyed to the Germans who had been engaged for various parts. This was all right for the Germans, but there were Hungarians to be taken care of. With the party was a French correspondent of a Hungarian film paper, and he was asked to help out. It is possible if the comedy could have been made into one of the talking variety the fun would have been more marked—between the English, French, German and Hungarian speakers. Mr. Brandt says the Imp foreign company has done some wonderful work. If we are to judge from the letter just received and what has been said on the subject of unexpected handicaps encountered by the players as related by King Baggot, lately returned, there can be no doubt of it. "The Anarchist," a single-reel subject, to be released by the Imp Company on October 23, in which Mr. Baggot and Miss Baird appear, is a strong picture. In it are a number of gendarmes—the genuine article, so we are told. Their acting is so realistic that it constitutes one of the features of the story. When the film was first shown it ran fifteen hundred feet, without titles—and the story was clear. It is hard to understand why a picture like this should be reduced when it was strong as it stood, and one like "The Cowboy Magnate," by the same general organization, should be allowed to drag its wearisome length through two reels.

Leah Baird.

Some day we'll have what Mr. Thanhouser at one time described as the natural reel. Then a good reel and a half will not be injured by cutting to a thousand feet or deadened by stretching to two thousand feet.

The Screen Club held its annual meeting at Bryant Hall on the evening of October 6. During the day about 35 per cent. of the members had dropped in at the clubrooms and deposited their ballots for officers of the organization for the coming year. John Bunny, who has been vice-president during the past year, declined a renomination, which was a matter of regret to many members. The officers elected were: President, King Baggot; first vice-president, J. W. Farnham; second vice-president, C. A. ("Doc") Willat; third vice-president, James Kirkwood; recording secretary, William F. Haddock; corresponding secretary, Hopp Hadley; treasurer, J. H. Gerhardt; members of the board of governors for two years, Arthur Leslie, Dave Wall, James Gordon and Billy Quirk. Reports of officers were read. Mr. Bunny gave some wholesome advice and told of plans he had in view to popularize the organization. President Baggot referred to the new clubhouse, which, it is expected, will be ready for occupancy in a few days. A committee was appointed to procure, if possible, the use of Madison Square Garden for the annual ball. There were many felicitations on the growth and prospects of the club.

According to the Albuquerque (N. M.) Journal, George P. Mr. Hamilton, it is said, contemplates organizing a company, providing he can interest local capital in the project.

North Yakima, Washington, as stated in this column a short time ago, established a local censorship board composed of five persons. Well, the board is no more. The city commissioners have dismissed the board, with thanks, and have passed an ordinance fixing a license fee for picture shows. Also, they have decreed that if any citizen can prove an exhibitor has shown a film which is objectionable his license will be forfeited. This means, of course, that the public will be its own censor. Such a course imposes much responsibility on each exhibitor, but the action of the commissioners seems to be in accordance with common law, an explanation of which in regard to censorship was so lucidly given by the late Mayor Gaynor.

Frank T. Montgomery, president of the Montgomery Amusement Company, of Jacksonville and other Southern cities, in a letter to the World has this to say about "Tess of the D'Urbervilles": "I have just finished a most successful engagement with the Fiske picture on our circuit. It was one of the best drawing cards I have ever shown, an admission price of 25 cents being charged at each stand."

The proprietor of the Colonade, in Nostrand Avenue, Brooklyn, said to the writer last week: "I showed 'Tess' on Wednesday, the day of the big rain, to good business, at 20 cents, double the usual admission. Between the showing of the pictures I lighted up the house and made a ten-minute intermission. After the run was started I advised all comers to wait until the next show, so that they might see the production properly. I believe this picture to be the greatest I ever saw on any screen. I ran it six times; it so appealed to me that I sat through five runs. I have asked for a return booking at the earliest possible date."

William F. Haddock sails for Santiago, Cuba, on October 11, under special engagement by the All Star Feature corporation to direct the making of "Soldiers of Fortune," in which Dustin Farnum in the role of Clay will be starred. Richard Harding Davis, the author of the novel, will be one of the party of a score or more accompanying Mr. Haddock, and will give his active assistance in the making of the picture. Lawrence McGill is so busy in the making of "Checkers" that he will be unable to go to Cuba. Augustus Thomas, who made the original dramatization from Mr. Davis' book, and who has prepared the script with the collaboration of Mr. Davis, is expected in Santiago as soon as he is able to get away from New York.

George L. Tucker, who has been directing Imp pictures and with marked success, sails for England on October 15. He will join the producing forces of the London Film Company, at the head of which is Harold Shaw, whose first production was recently described in a cable dispatch from Dr. Jupp, the president of the company, as a "huge success." Mr. Shaw's last engagement on this side of the water was with the Imp company, and it is fair to assume that the favorable opinion then formed by Mr. Shaw of the work of Mr. Tucker is responsible for the new engagement. Mr. Tucker, it is reliably stated, will receive a good-sized salary. He will take with him the best wishes of a host of friends and admirers. Walter MacNamara, who has been writing scripts for Mr. Tucker and generally assisting him, will have charge of the company.

CINCINNATI LOCKOUT SETTLED.

Exhibitors and Operators Get Together—New Ordinance Passed and Mayor Promises Protection.

QUIET again reigns among moving picture theater owners and their union operators in Cincinnati, Ohio. The lockout of union operators inaugurated on Monday, September 22nd, by members of the Cincinnati branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, ended on the afternoon of Tuesday, September 30th, when the owners signed the union agreement and the men went back to work.

On the evening of the same day, the city council passed the new ordinance, requiring motion picture operators to be licensed. This new ordinance takes the place of an ordinance recently knocked out by a decision of Superior Court Judge Spiegel. The passage of the ordinance is declared to be a decisive victory for the union operators, in that the members of the union have always contended that licensing of operators was favored by them, while the owners have objected to the licensing of operators, because the licensing board has given preference to union operators.

On Monday morning, September 29th, the Ways and Means Committee of council, meeting with the operators and owners, relative to the new ordinance, completely exonerated the members of the examining board of the charges brought by the owners that the board had played favorites in granting licenses.

On Tuesday, September 30, the union operators met with their employees and the result was an amicable settlement. Following the settlement of the differences that had existed between them, both sides declared that there was a better understanding now and the possibilities of further breaks will be more remote in the future.

At the close of the meeting, parties interested in the trouble declared that the boycott established against the Victor Theater, some weeks ago, when it is said the proprieter had refused to employ a union piano player, was the cause of the lockout.

Attorney Lem Miller and President M. A. Neff, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, had a long conference with Mayor Hunt Friday afternoon, October 3, relative to the appointment of the new licensing board, necessary under the new ordinance. The mayor promised that the owners would be protected and intimated that they might name a majority of the board. The appointments will be made as soon as the ordinance becomes effective.

EXHIBITORS ORGANIZE AT PORTLAND, ORE.

The motion picture exhibitors, of Portland, Ore., have organized a local exhibitors' league and elected the following offices: President, Melvin G. Winstock, Peoples Theater; Vice-President, J. A. Bradt, Echo Theater; Secretary, W. E. Stevens, Woodlawn Theater; Treasurer, G. T. Holtzclaw, Cineograph Theater; Sergeant-at-Arms, T. M. McGuire, Bakeronian Theater. Executive Board: O. T. Bargner, Columbia Theater; I. Lester Cohen, Globe Theater; Mr. Langerman, New Grand Theater; H. C. Stevens, Casino Theater; J. A. Bradt, Echo Theater. Judiciary Committee, H. C. Phillip, Knob Hill Theater; R. Z. Duke, Princess Theater; E. T. Pittman, Union Avenue Theater.

The organization will have permanent quarters and will meet twice a month. H. C. Stevens, Jr., was appointed to attend a meeting of the State Board of Charities at which the censorship question is to be discussed.

KANSAS LEAGUE TO MEET.

Official announcement is made that the Kansas State Exhibitors' League will hold its third annual convention at Hutchinson, Kan., on Oct. 20 and 21. There is much business of importance to be transacted and the subject of adverse legislation is to be discussed. It is expected that fully 150 members will be present. Address E. Wayne Martin, National Vice-President, Hutchinson, Kan., for particulars.

NEW FILM TARIFF SCHEDULES.

Now that President Wilson has signed the new tariff bill, it will be of interest to readers of the Moving Picture World to note the differences in the schedules affecting motion picture film. According to the old law all negatives paid twenty-five per cent. ad valorem duty and all positives paid one and one-half cents per linear foot.

The provisions of the new law require a duty of two cents per foot on exposed but undeveloped negative; three cents per foot on exposed and developed negative, and one cent per foot on positive prints. All raw stock is on the free list.

STATE RIGHT DEALS.

Arthur D. Gans, representing the Interstate Feature Film Co., of Baltimore, while on a buying expedition to New York last week, purchased the rights on the Itala-Danmark subject "The War Correspondents" for Delaware, Maryland, District of Columbia and Virginia. Mr. Gans has succeeded Warren A. Kline as manager of the Interstate, Mr. Kline having decided to give his full attention to his theater interests. The Electric Theater Supply Co., of Philadelphia, will have the exclusive rights on forthcoming Itala subjects in the territory mentioned, in addition to Eastern Pennsylvania and Southern New Jersey.

Following in the lines of Manchester and London, an exhibition of kinematography is to be held in Glasgow, from February 17th to 26st, next year. # Manufacturers Advance Notes

"BRONCHO BILLY GETS SQUARE" (Essanay).

For the first time in the history of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, and in the history of "Broncho Billy," Mr. G. M. Anderson will appear in his own production of two reels, entitled "Broncho Billy Gets Square." The first multiple reel Western is a worthy feature with many exciting and thrilling scenes. The photography is far above par and the story is clear and clean throughout.

Scene from "Broncho Billy Gets Square" (Essanay).

We see Miss Evelyn Selbie in a different character—that of an Indian squaw, and she plays the part in a remarkably clever manner. The story deals with an outlaw partner of Broncho Billy's, who, becoming jealous of the attentions the Indian girl is bestowing upon "Broncho Billy," turns State's evidence and gives the notorious outlaw up to the authority of the law. Fifteen years is spent at the rock pile and when freedom is restored to Broncho Billy, he starts out to seek revenge. Revenge is sweet and our hero, although an outlaw, is praised for straightening out a romantic tangle. "Broncho Billy Gets Square" is booked for release Oct. 17th.

KLEINE'S "POMPEII" OPENS AT SPOKANE.

The Photo Drama Company's six-part production, "The Last Days of Pompeii," presented in America by George Kleine, opens at the American Theater, Spokane, Wash., Tuesday, October 14th, for an indefinite run. This will mark the first performance of this picture in this country.

ITALA COMPANY MOVES ITS OFFICES.

The Candler Building, 220 West 42nd Street, New York, will henceforth be the address of the Itala Film Company, which moved its offices from the Columbia Theater Building last week. The Itala Film Company now occupies part of the suite on the tenth floor of the Candler Building formerly used by the Exclusive Supply Corporation. This office is directly opposite the All Star Feature Corporation's offices, an advantage to Harry R. Raver, who as director-general of the Itala and president of the All Star found it inconvenient to have his interests geographically scattered.

Harry Lande, proprietor of the Feature Photoplay Co., formerly located in the Exchange Building, has moved his effects to the Candler Building, and hereafter the offices of that concern will be behind the door numbered 903.

"IN THE MOUNTAINS OF VIRGINIA" (American).

The "Flying A" subject under this title emphasizes the versatility of its actors. The local color of a mountain rendezvous of a moonshiner's camp with complete still in operation lends the customary detail for which the productions of this company are noted.

Scene from "In the Mountains of Virginia" (American).

Harry Von Meter plays the lead as the physician who repairs to the mountain fastnesses for a much needed rest. He falls in love with the daughter of his host, is accepted by the young lady, but the jealousy of the latter's former sweetheart causes him to be accused of being a government officer, for which he is condemned to die. Through rare good fortune, he escapes the bullets of his executioners and enruote to the mountain cabin he does the samaritan act. The plot against him is exposed and he is vindicated. The story is told in a convincing manner.

"THE FLIRT" (Reliance).

Exceedingly clever is the very least that can be said of "The Flirt," a high class comedy from the gifted pen of Will. M. Hough, author of many notable stage successes including "The Girl Question," and "A Stubborn Cinderella." The well known stage favorite, Anna Laughlin, plays the Flirt in her happiest manner and is ably supported by Charles Dickson and an excellent cast. Released Wednesday, October 15th. Above is an illustration from the picture.

"THE MATE OF THE SCHOONER SADIE" (Lubin).

The curse of drink is here pictured with the most dramatic intensity. It is a story of the sea; madness crushing out the life of a brave seaman and true lover, leaving the girl who was to be his wife to mourn over the wedding dress she was preparing for a life of happiness.

Lute Drew, mate of the schooner Sadie, is in love with Beth, daughter of John Ross, the captain. Lute is a fine fellow, but his father had been a man who drank heavily and one day liquor crazed, attempting to strike his wife, he dropped dead. Lute with this horrible picture in mind always refused drink. The night before a voyage, Lute visited Beth at the captain's home and Ross prevailed upon him to drink a toast to Beth, who would be his bride on the return after the voyage. Lute took the drink and on leaving the house the craving led him to a saloon where he became crazy drunk. He made his way to the ship and there insulted the captain, who promptly knocked him down. The seamen secured Lute and he was arrested, but escaped. He again boarded the ship and attacked the captain; being pursued he climbed out on the bowsprit, there falling into the sea and being lost forever, while Beth is at home sewing on her wedding dress.

Scene from "The Mate of the Schooner Sadie" (Lubin).

AMUSEMENT SUPPLY COMPANY CATALOG.

The catalog recently issued by the Amusement Supply Company, of Chicago, is a comprehensive book containing everything necessary in the equipping of a theater. To list everything catalogued between its two covers in its 112 pages would require the reprinting of their entire index, which in itself takes up a whole page. Everything in it has been neatly and tastefully arranged by Mr. Traub, properly illustrated and well displayed.

On the inside back cover he has tacked a supplement illustrating all the parts of the Motiograph 1913 Model Arc Lamp, improved parts of the Motiograph 1912 Model, Motiograph parts, Power's Nos. 5, 6 and 6-A parts. This little supplement in itself is worth a good deal to the exhibitor or operator who is not thoroughly familiar with all the small and intricate parts of the machine.

Besides this feature, all the different makes of machines are listed, and their different parts. In fact the catalog tells about everything necessary in the operating booth, not only for the theater in the big city, but also in towns where electricity is not available, it lists gas making outfits and also tents for the itinerant showman. For the furnishing of a theater it lists all necessary articles.

The catalog is printed on good quality paper and has an especially heavy colored cover with an illustration of a theater on its front cover. It is neat and well compiled.

WORLD SPECIAL GETS "POMPEII."

Mr. E. Mandelbaum, president of the World Special Films Corporation, has acquired the exhibition rights to "The Last Days of Pompeii" made by Pasquali in Turin, Italy. This production, which is now playing at Wallack's Theater, New York, is one of the first purchases of the corporation and arrangements have been made with K. & E. to book it in their houses throughout the country.

"A HUSBAND'S STRATEGY" (Great Northern).

This is a clever dramatic story dealing with the quarrel, separation and final reunion of a young married couple. According to the plot, the Countess Holten invites Aileen, the wife of a rich banker, James Perrin, to help at a charity bazaar. We are next given a glimpse of this beautiful function and Aileen appears to have attracted the favor of young Count Holten, a dashing army officer. Mrs. Perrin is a stall holder and the young count proves to be one of her best customers and pays her ardent attention. During an intermission, the young count is discovered kissing the hand of Mrs. Perrin and later meetings disturb the peace of mind of the banker. He tries to put a stop to the flirtation, but does not succeed and in the course of time he is served with divorce papers.

Scene from "A Husband's Strategy" (Gt. Northern).

Aileen makes her home with her aunt and accepts a position as companion to Miss Clara Evans, a wealthy spinster. Mr. Perrin pays the latter a visit at a seaside resort and pretends to show her marked attention. Every moment of Aileen's waking moments are tortured by the thought of what might have been. Soon a party is organized to visit an ancient ruin in the locality and Perrin bribes the old caretaker to lock himself and his wife in the ruins after the others have departed. They wander through the deserted chambers, which are said to be visited by ghosts and finally visit the battlements.

After gazing silently into the night and awaiting the dawn, a reconcilation is effected and when the old caretaker returns to his duties, husband and wife are reunited. The photoplay is splendidly acted and is up to the Great Northern standard of excellence.

STATE RIGHT DEALS FOR THE WEST.

Sol Lesser now controls state rights to "Arizona" for eleven Western and Pacific Coast States, having added Utah, Colorado, Wyoming, and New Mexico to his previously acquired territory. In addition to the four states above mentioned, Mr. Lesser, operating as the Northwestern Feature Film Co., controls Montana, Oregon, Washington and Idaho; while operating as the Golden Gate Film Exchange, he controls California, Arizona, and Nevada.

GUNBY BROS. REMOVAL.

Gunby Bros., Inc., have removed to 145 West 45th St., New York, where they will be in a position to give their customers a more prompt service than ever. Gunby Bros. have built up a very large trade in film titles and developing and printing. They have developed negatives and made positive prints from same in as short a time as 4 hours, but they generally take from 18 to 24 hours to develop their customers' negatives and have a print ready for shipment.

AMMEX ADDED TO "EXCLUSIVE" PROGRAM.

The Ammex Film Co., for a long time inactive, has come back into the field as a manufacturer of feature films. Its first release will be "The Barrier of Blood," the second "The Reckoning," both in two reels. F. D. Halliday, representative, started eastward last week and will arrange with Joseph R. Miles to vigorously push the resurrected product.

LAURA SAWYER ALIAS KATE KIRBY.

The Famous Players Film Co. has created a new female detective, an ingenious, aggressive, original film character whose corporate correlative is Laura Sawyer, late leading woman of the Edison Co. In "Chelsea 7750" she supported Henry E. Dixey and assisted him in trailing and tracking the resourceful gang of counterfeiters; in "An Hour Before Dawn," to be released October 20th, a sequel to "Chelsea 7750," she strikes new fields, introduces new methods, and incidentally saves two lovers from the penalty for a crime which they did not commit, although their guilt seemed rather evident.

Laura Sawyer.

Written and directed by J. Searle Dawley, the story is based on the astounding discovery by Signor Ulivii, an Italian engineer, of a powerful, elemental destructive force which has recently created a sensation in the scientific world.

NEW LEADING MAN FOR "FLYING A."

Sidney Ayers, who has enjoyed a very successful career on the legitimate stage and is well known in moving pictures, has been engaged to play leads for the American Film Manufacturing Company. Mr. Ayers wrote the play "Texas," and himself played the lead under the Erlanger management. He has also played the title role in "Ben Hur" for several seasons. Under Morosco, as also under Belasco, Mr. Ayers played stock in all principal Western cities. In moving pictures he has played leads with "101 Bison," Selig, Edison and others. His first appearance in "Flying A" subjects will be in "The Occult," release of which will be announced shortly.

"HOW THE JEWS CARE FOR THEIR POOR" (Imp).

Director Sidney Golden is putting on an educational picture of one reel length that should not alone appeal to Jews but to every one, as it shows many of the executive heads of New York's important Jewish institutions taking part. It goes further than simply showing the methods used in caring for the poor; one is taken into the various hospitals and philanthropic societies and shown the tragedy and humor that abounds in these places. The picture will no doubt be released through the Imp brand. One of the prominent persons appearing in the picture is Mr. Guisemyer, superintendent of the Jewish Orphan Asylum.

Notes of the Trade

TWO comedies from the pen of the well known comedian and humorist Junie McCree, will be released by Reliance on October 20th, as a split-reel offering. "Oh, What a Night" is the title of the first comedy, while the second, which is a starring vehicle for the famous Hippodrome mule, Pete, will be the first of a series of "Mule" stories, entitled: "Two Men and a Mule."

News comes from Rome that the Cines Company has completed arrangements to reproduce the famous drama, "Madame Tallien," written by V. Sardou. For this purpose Director Guazzoni, the producer who made "Quo Vadis?" has employed the operatic troupe of Gandusio Borelli-Hiperno, well known throughout Continental Europe for its rendition of Sardou's masterpiece. It is not known at this time how many reels will be required to tell the celebrated story.

Bert Angeles, of Vitagraph fame, is now producing Oliver Doud Byron's famous play, "Across the Continent," for the Pilot Company. This will be a four-part feature, and promises to meet with even greater success than "The Streets of New York," recently produced by Pilot.

Augustus Thomas, director-general of productions for the All Star Feature Corporation, has secured the assistance of Henry M. Blossom, author of "Checkers," and dramatizer of his own novel, in the staging of "Checkers" as a silent drama. From Mr. Blossom's dramatization of his own novel and from the novel itself a scenario has been made by Eustace Hale Ball and Lawrence McGill, and upon the basis of this scenario the play will be staged under the supervision of Mr. Thomas and Mr. Blossom.

Miss Kathlyn Williams is one of the few actresses to write, direct and act a photoplay. This versatile leading woman is at present producing at the Selig Zoo in Los Angeles a two reel picture, entitled: "A Leopard's Foundling," a product of her own pen, in which she is playing the leading part. This is Miss William's first experience at directing.

Territorial rights to Indiana and Illinois for the All Star Feature Corporation's production of "Arizona" have been acquired by the Famous Players Film Service, of Pittsburgh. This purchase is in addition to the rights for Western Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio and Kentucky, already purchased by the same service.

CORRESPONDENCE

LOUISVILLE.

THE coincidence of the Kentucky State Fair and much cooler weather in Louisville last week, resulted in packed houses for all of the downtown theaters, and those which showed anything out of the ordinary were packed day and night. L. J. Dittmar, of the Majestic, which showed Mrs. Fiske in "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," for four days of the week, had remarkably good business, as did other houses in the path of the crowds.

The Imp production of "Ivanhoe," which was run at the Novelty Theater, in Louisville, Thursday and Friday of last week, was a pronounced success with patrons of the Fourth avenue house, and bids fair to meet with equally enthusiastic approval wherever shown in the city.

The Parkland Amusement Company, of Louisville, which has just closed a highly successful season at the Parkland Airdome, has definitely announced its intention of building a $30,000 theater in that suburb to handle the business during the winter months. Plans will be prepared shortly, and it is hoped to have the new theater in operation within a few months.

The Switow Amusement Company, of Louisville, continues to acquire new houses for its string in Kentucky and Indiana, and to operate them with conspicuous success. The company recently opened its new house at Salem, Ind., with good business. The capacity of this house is 600. A pretty theater is being built by the company at Martinsville, Ind., to handle moving pictures and vaudeville combined, a seating capacity of 700 being provided for. The opera house recently purchased at Madison, Ind., is being remodeled, and will shortly be opened as a photoplay and vaudeville house.

S. E. Nestor, of Louisville, Ky., who had the state rights for the great Cines-Kleine film, "Quo Vadis?" has sold his rights, and has purchased a new feature for Kentucky, entitled, "The Female Raffles."

Among the new houses started recently in Kentucky, are those of A. L. Wolf, of Olive Hill, Ky., and R. W. Taylor, of Beaverdam, Ky. Mr. Taylor's house is the first at Beaver Dam.

The Louisville management of the Central Film Service Company has nearly won over Manager Robertson, of the Bowling Green (Ky.), opera house, for the Universal program. Mr. Robertson has heretofore followed the policy of showing nothing but feature films at his house, but as the Universal service is now releasing five features a week with the regular program, he is seriously considering whether it would not be to his advantage to take on this service instead of having to keep on the lookout for enough good features on the outside to fill up the program.

William Hogan, of Louisville, who runs the Ohio, the leading colored theater of the Falls City, recently contracted with the Central Film Service Company for the Universal program.

Pennington & Saults, of New Albany, Ind., has recently completed a new theater at Sellewsburg, Ind. Universal service will be used.

The Maggard-Bardley Company was recently formally incorporated at Moorehead, Ky., with a capital stock of $250,000, for the purpose of manufacturing the "Perfect" projecting machine. Those interested are: S. M. Bradley, E. E. Maggard, B. S. Wilson and J. B. Peers. A. M. Beatty, of Denver, Col., formerly with the Edison Company, is another of the incorporators, and will act as sales manager. The company has opened offices at 95 Liberty street, New York, as well as in Denver and Chicago. The plant at Moorehead is thoroughly equipped, and has a capacity of 50 to 100 machines a day. The frame of the Bradley-Maggard Machine is of aluminum, and the whole is so fitted that it rests on its carrying case as a base, dropping into the case when not in use. Case and machine weigh about 20 pounds. It is claimed that the machine is extremely simple in operation.

C. H. Bleich, who has been in charge of the Garrick Theater, at Madisonville, Ky., for the past year, resigned recently, in order to accept a position in a larger city. The house was recently purchased by the Switow Amusement Company, of Louisville, and will be operated by that concern.

Two new motion picture houses are under way in Hazard, Ky., which has shown much activity since the beginning of coal operations in that vicinity. Kinner & Johnson are putting up a three-story building, which will have a completely equipped theater on the first floor, with a balcony and dressing rooms, the seating capacity being 224; and Antonie Zollers, of Jeffersonville, Ind., has recently purchased a lot measuring 31 x 100 feet, upon which he will build a first-class picture show building, with a balcony, orchestra pit, and all modern improvements for such a house. The Perry Lumber & Supply Company will erect the theater. Excavation is under way, and as soon as detailed plans are received from the architect work will begin.

E. S. Tribble, the contractor, has started work in Henderson, Ky., upon the remodeling of the Haag Building on Second street, for the new Princess Theater. A partition wall will be torn out, making a room large enough to seat 800 persons, and a large balcony will be constructed around the sides and in the rear.

Sil Dinelli, owner of the Winchester, Ky., opera house, recently leased the house for the season to the Central Film Company, of Cincinnati and New York. The new management will conduct a picture show in the theater, with occasional attractions of other varieties.

A new picture show will occupy the room now used by the Frankfort Bakery, in Frankfort, Ky., to be known as the Gem. The former Gem Theater was destroyed by fire recently, and James Taylor, the owner, promptly made arrangements to secure the property referred to for his show. It will be operated as a five-cent house.

The new photoplay house owned by Preston Grubbs, was opened at Lawrenceburg, Ky., a few days ago, with a special program, the ladies attending being presented with souvenirs of the occasion.

The Theatorium, a picture show at Sturgis, Ky., which was destroyed by a fire which wiped out most of the business section of the town several months ago, will be rebuilt, with a number of other buildings, during the fall. Frank Cox, a Chicago contractor, will rebuild most of the structures destroyed, and Manager E. L. Rakes hopes to have his theater going again before long in its own home. In the meantime he has changed his outdoor show into one more suited to cold weather by a move into the opera house, where he will exhibit until the new theater is completed.

Corcoran Brothers, of Cincinnati, O., are planning to spend close to $100,000 in the erection of a high-class motion picture theater on Central avenue, between Fourteenth and Fifteenth streets. The firm purchased 75 feet on the street at an average price of $300 a front foot, and Architect J. F. Sheblessy has been retained to prepare plans for the playhouse. Corcoran Brothers now control two large houses in Cincinnati, have another in Chicago, and two others in other cities.

NEW ENGLAND AND CANADA.

HARRY ASHER, general manager of the Famous Players Film Company of New England, with offices at 100 Boylston street, Boston, has been very successful in closing contracts with New England houses.

Mr. Henry F. Campbell, New England manager of Warner's Features, is closing his program of three multiple-reel features weekly with a number of Boston exhibitors.

The Huntington avenue Theater, Boston, is doing a good business with a large picture program. Admission is 15 cents for the orchestra, and 10 cents for the balcony. The program changes 3 times weekly.

A recent incorporation is Jannelli & Boschetti, Inc., of Boston. This is a $50,000 concern, with Frank Boschetti, Salvatore Jannelli and Carmela Jannelli named as the promoters. This concern owns a number of electric theaters and also operates a well-known feature film exchange.

Mayor John F. Fitzgerald, of Boston, called the managers of the "legitimate" theaters to a conference this week. The mayor stated he would insist on clean plays, and told the managers he would not permit certain plays now in New York, to be presented in the Hub. The mayor also called attention to the practice of placing large frames, containing printed matter and photographs on easels, where they might cause disaster in the case of a rush from the theaters, in case of fire. He requested that all such frames and advertising boards should be suspended from the walls in a secure way, and not left where people may trip over them. The mayor will call the moving picture men to him next week, when all the "don'ts" will be explained.

The meeting of the unionizing and grievance committee of the Boston Central Labor Union, on September 15, was not a very large one as most of the active members were delegates to the Massachusetts State Branch, A. F. of L. convention then in session at Fall River. It was reported that the grievance of the union at a local theater has been pleasantly settled. The trouble was considered of sufficient importance for the Central Labor Union to call a meeting of the representatives of all the unions, which have members employed at, or in any way connected with theaters, to consider joint action, if necessary.

"Dr. Nicholson and the Blue Diamond," the first release of the Film Releases of America, under the banner of the Exclusive Supply Corporation, has been sold to the Famous Players Film Company, of New England, while the Consolidated Feature Film Company has secured the picture for Canada.

The Griffin Amusement Company, of Canada, is shortly to build a theater at Berlin, Ont., to exploit vaudeville and photoplay programs. This house will be up to the regular Griffin standard, and will cost about $65,000.

St. Catherines, Ontario, Can., will also soon have a new and up-to-date vaudeville and picture house, to be erected by the Griffin Amusement Company. The cost of this house is estimated at $75,000.

It is stated that F. A. Noyes, of Boston, will build a moving picture house at Stoughton, Mass., to seat about 800 persons.

Mr. T. S. Maguire, of East Walpole, Mass., has plans calling for a moving picture theater at Walpole, to cost about $10,000. The site selected measures 34 by 80 feet.

The Imperial theater, the new Keith Theater, at St. Johns, N. B., opened on September 19, with a big program of pictures and vaudeville. The Imperial is a large, expensive theater.

Poli's Theater, Hartford, Conn., closed its season of stock company attractions last week, to enter upon the regular season of vaudeville and pictures.

Mr. Walter J. Murphy, manager of the Lyceum Theater, New London, Conn., is doing his usual good business with vaudeville and pictures. Mr. Murphy is a popular and able exhibitor, and was presented with a gold case by the New London Elks, this week.

The Griffin Amusement Company will build a theater at London, Ont., Can., before long, as this concern has purchased property upon which to build.

Mr. Edward J. Sullivan reports he is now connected with the Hiram Abrams Amusement Company, of Portland, Me., in the capacity of general manager. Mr. Sullivan now has general supervision over the B. F. Keith, New Portland and Big Nickel Theaters, and formerly was manager of the Studebaker Theater, Chicago, Ill., and also acted as manager for Sarah Bernhardt when she made her American tours.

The Woonsocket Theater, Woonsocket, R. I., rounded out twenty-five years of existence on September 20, and this anniversary was celebrated in a fitting way.

Mr. Bert Russell, manager of the Empire and Lyceum Theaters, Edmonton, Can., and Mr. C. L. Gill, manager of Pantages Theater, that city, have just signed agreements with the Edmonton branch of the International Association of Stage Hands, which will be effective until March 1, 1916. It is understood that the union secured nearly all its requests, including some increase in wages and recognition.

Mr. Arthur B. Woolsey, owner of the Weseley Theater, at Greenfield, Mass., is a benedict, having married Miss Florence Codling, on September 7.

"One Hundred Years of Mormonism" was shown at Walter Linehan's Gilmore Theater, Springfield, Mass., September 18-20. It pulled well.

Manager E. L. Knight, of the Bijou Theater, Springfield, Mass., reports good business. "The Resurrection" pictures, with Miss Blanche Walsh, proved very popular with the Bijou's audiences.

The Edisonia, a moving picture theater, at Springfield, is now well settled in its new "home" on Main Street, just a few blocks south of its old location. The old location of the Edisonia is to be reopened under the name of the Princess Theater.

Competition at Attleboro, Mass., is very keen, and Manager John Patten, of the Bates Theater, and Manager A. H. Allen, of the Columbia Theater, have installed orchestras. Manager Patten offers a ladies orchestra, an innovation that is meeting with approval. Both theaters are doing nicely.

Lawler Brothers, owning the Lawler Theater, at Greenfield, Mass., have opened a motion picture theater at Northfield, Mass., to good business.

The Grand Theater, New Haven, Conn., has been doing a capacity business since it reopened for the new season on September 15. Pictures and vaudeville is the policy.

The Methodist Church at Vancouver, Can., is about to open a theater in this city to offer moving picture programs, to consist of films that deal with the activities of church and missionary work. If this prospect is successful, the plan is to run a chain of theaters right through Canada.

The Provincial Government, Canada, has appointed a moving picture censor, to whom all films must be shown before being exhibited to the public. All pictures failing to pass the censor are "dead," so far as their exhibition is concerned. The censor is to inspect all moving picture theaters with a view to proper ventilation, fire escapes, etc.

Mr. W. D. Ascough, manager of Poli's Theater, at Hartford, Conn., has finished his "stock" season, and entered upon the vaudeville and picture policy, September 22.

Keeney's Theater, New Britain, Conn., is now undergoing extensive alterations. The house is being redecorated, and new fixtures installed.

Manager F. G. Spencer's Unique Theater, at St. John, Can., has a new front that adds considerably to its appearance.

The Central Square Theater, Lynn, Mass., is being repaired, and upon its completion, Colonel Stanton, the manager, intends to offer "big time" vaudeville and photoplay features.

The Colonial Theater, of Lowell, has incorporated, with an authorized capital of $8,000. Solomon Knopf, Samuel Abrams and Leo Abrams are the promoters.

The Atkinson-Browne Company, of Boston, has incorporated for $1,000, with Charles F. Atkinson, Eugene W. Browne and John W. Luce named as the officers.

"LOOK AROUND TO YOUR HEART'S CONTENT"—

MIRROROIDE

PATENTS PENDING

Universally conceded the world's best. Is the screen you will eventually buy—nothing on earth can win you away from the simple truth! The evidence of your own eyes! Our five-year guarantee! The five thousand MIRROROIDE users—all MIRROROIDE boosters. We don't indulge in braggadocio—we are only too glad to show you facts by sending you postpaid large free samples. Test against any screen in your town.

MIRROROIDE

is now made in three different shades—silver white, silver flesh, amber (pale gold, two grades, A and B); same quality of cloth; same quality of metalized glass finish.

Our B grade is the only screen that will give perfect pictures close up or at an angle view. This is the grade used in the largest theatres the world over. A grade is the standard for theatres under 30 feet in width. The simple truth is disparaging to our competitors. They know, as all MIRROROIDE users know, MIRROROIDE is sold strictly on merit, backed up by plain truth.

THE QUESTION OF PRICE

MIRROROIDE is in a price division all by itself—due to proper factory facilities, efficient employees, ample capital, massive coating machines and made by men who know.

Our factory is five stories in height. Output 4,000 square yards of MIRROROIDE weekly. Floor space 13,500 square feet. Some plant, but it's devoted absolutely to

MIRROROIDE

Do you know our plant is running day and night? Do you know that last week's shipments alone consisted of 92 screens, 12 of which were over 18 x 22? Do you know that we shipped 9 screens to Philadelphia, Pa., 11 to Pittsburgh, Pa., 7 to New York City Borough, 8 to Toledo, Ohio? All in one week—this is simple truth.

OUR NEW METHOD OF HANGING

(Patents Pending.)

Adapted October 6th, simplifies the hanging. You can build your own frames at a cost of from 3 to 6 dollars. We provide stretcher free, and we show you by means of cuts how to do it.

Now get wise, write at once. Let us send you the evidence of your own eyes—our large free samples. Let us put you in touch with our nearest MIRROROIDE agency. Do it now.

The New Tariff Benefits Exhibitors

"Electra" Pink Label Carbon Prices Reduced

IT gives me much pleasure to announce to the trade that my fight for lower duty on "Electra" Pink Label Carbons has been successful. The new tariff bill just signed by President Wilson lowers the rate on carbons from 65 cents per 100 feet to 40 cents per 100 feet.

True to my promise to the Senate and House Committees, that I would give the benefit of any reduction to the consumer, I have made the following reduced list prices on "Electra" Pink Label Carbons:

LICENSED FILM STORIES

PATHEPLAY.

A YANKEE IN MEXICO (Oct. 14).—John Harvey, a chivalrous young American, seeing a Mexican brutally maltreating a Peon woman, interferes. The American's kindly act is seen by Dolores Betancourt, a Mexican girl of old Castilian descent, who is loved by the Mexican. Harvey becoming acquainted with Dolores arouses the jealousy of the Mexican, who craftily plots a duel between Harvey and himself and intends to secretly remove the cartridge from the American's revolver just before the duel. His cowardly plot is overheard by Dolores, who in turn withdraws the cartridge from the Mexican's revolver. After the duel she denounces the Mexican and all ends happily. A Patheplay of peculiar interest not only because of its intrinsic merit, but in view of the present prominence of Mexican troubles.

THE PETRIFIED FOREST OF ARIZONA (Oct. 14).—One of the most interesting places in the United States is seen in this film. Contrary to popular opinion, the trees were not native to the spot where they now lie, but in the prehistoric age were carried thither by a flood of hot water holding silicates in suspension. These silicates were taken up by the wood, which thus became turned to stone.

HER HOUR (Oct. 15),—Gertrude Marsh, when too young to know her own mind, married a man of brutal and dissipated character. In a saloon brawl he receives a hard blow on the head and is placed in an unconscious state upon a freight car. He regains consciousness in a far distant city, his memory totally gone—a victim to aphasia. His wife in order to support herself becomes a nurse in a hospital and falls in love with one of the doctors, whom two years later, believing her husband dead, she marries. Three years later her real husband receives a severe electrical shock, which restores his memory. Returning to his home town he seeks his wife and ultimately finds her. What happens? See the film. It has a very strong dramatic ending.

IN THE HAUNTS OF FEAR (Special—2 parts—Oct. 16).—A strong dramatic Patheplay abounding in thrills and intensely dramatic and unexpected situations. Bert Barker, a young ne'er-do-well, finally exhausts his father's patience, who orders him away from his home and forbids him to return. As he goes across the fields he discovers the body of a man who has just been held up and killed by a highwayman. While examining it he is seen by some men, who assume that he is the murderer. Bert, however, escapes and goes West. The highwayman in the meanwhile goes on to the town to call upon his sweetheart, whom he eventually marries. Later on they also leave for the West on a prairie schooner. Their party is attacked by Indians and all the men are killed. The massacre is discovered by Bert Barker, who finds the girl (who has lost her memory from the shock) and takes her to his cabin. Later they are married by a circuit rider. In the meantime it has been discovered in Bert's home town that he is innocent of the crime and his father offers a reward of $500 for his discovery. Through the circuit rider he is identified and returns with his wife to his former home. Old time scenes bring back her memory, only to see in her present husband the supposed murderer whom she had known. After a strong situation matters are cleared up and all ends happily. Be sure and get this one.

THE BULLET'S MARK (Oct. 17).—Frank Merrill, a rich ranchman, saves two gypsy girls from arrest. The girls are deeply grateful and their gratitude excites the jealousy of the lover of one of them. Later on while Merrill is bear hunting the bullet he intends for the bear wounds the gypsy, who on being carried to the camp demands the rancher's death. Lots are drawn to determine who shall be the assassin. Fate decrees that one of the two grateful girls should draw the dreaded number. Much against her will she seeks Merrill out, but breaks down when the opportunity to kill him is given her. He saves her from the wrath of the gypsies and there is a happy ending.

A PLANT WITH NERVES (Oct. 18).—This most interesting plant, the Mimosa Pudica, has a wide distribution. Each leaf is made up of 15 pairs of tiny leaflets. Tap any single leaflet gently at the tip and with its companion leaflet it curls up at once. A sharp blow on any stem causes all the leaflets on the stem to curl up, one pair at a time. A similar blow on the main stem causes all the leaflets to curl up, as does a Leyden jar placed near by. A lighted match held near by causes all the leaves to droop with the heat. If the plant is placed under a glass jar containing a piece of cotton saturated with chloroform the plant becomes asphyxiated, but revives on being restored to the open air. As the "Sensitive plant" it has long been famous in literature, but few people have seen it to know it. A strong educational film.

ST. CLAUDE, AND ITS ENVIRONS (Oct. 18).—St. Claude is a charming French city in most attractive surroundings. It is remarkable in that it has preserved the architecture and the customs of "the olden, golden days" and the visitor bridges the centuries as he walks the city streets. Around it are lofty mountains, snow blanketed in winter and nodding with flowers and verdure in the summer. It is a land of delight, of sweet odors, balmy breezes, bright colored flowers and foaming springs. A most interesting travel film.

THE SONG OF DEATH (Oct. 23).—An exceedingly dramatic multiple reel Patheplay. The story is built on the success of a young matron whose voice brings her fame and adulation. She has sworn to her husband that she will always be faithful to him. She keeps her oath, but at what cost must be learned from the film.

PATHE'S WEEKLY, NO. 56, 1913.—St. Louis, Mo.—In order that the U. S. Army may be on the same basis as the other nations, from an aeronautical standpoint, Albert B. Lambert organizes the U. S. Aero Reserves, a volunteer company of expert aviators, with headquarters in this city.

Shanghai, China.—The rebellion against the government in this city grows to such proportions that the French army is compelled to throw up a barricade to prevent invasion of the French quarter.

New York, N. Y.—The new president of the New York, New Haven & Hartford R. R., Howard Elliott, is presented with a loving cup by the Spokane, Wash., Chamber of Commerce.

Browning, Mont.—Mrs. Helen Fitzgerald Sanders, the author of "Trails Through Western Woods" and known to the Indians as "Much-a-Ni-Cha," visits the Blackfeet tribe to learn and preserve their history.

Memphis, Tenn.—Firemen test the new tower erected for company drills in the handling of life nets, ladders, hose and other apparatus adopted in progressive cities. The structure is 70 feet high and 20 feet square at base.

Providence, R. I.—30,000 men, representing 76 branches of the Holy Name Society, march in one of the largest parades of this character ever held in New England.

Two Medicine Lake, Mont.—Chief Three Bears, the oldest living Indian in the Blackfeet tribe, and a former great warrior, visits an old camping ground here to celebrate his annual ceremony of worship to the sun.

Editorial Section.—The opponents of the present "One-Battleship-a-Year" policy of the Navy Department have extracted a strong argument from the fact that Japan has at present four men-of-war under construction, the first of which, the "Kongo," 27,500 tons, with a speed of 27 knots, makes her trial trip at Plymouth England.

THE POISONED STREAM (Oct. 21).—A dramatic story of the bad effect of unreturned love upon an unscrupulous person. Two sisters who are sheep owners have been pasturing their sheep upon the ranch of their next neighbor, who owns the only spring for miles around. Their neighbor sells his ranch, thus hazarding their right of pasture. His foreman, who is to be retained by the new owner, tells the girls that he can secure a continuation of their right, but only on condition that one of them marry him. Each indignantly refuses. He then drives their sheep from the place. Later one of the girls meets the new owner, a doctor, who being favorably impressed with her renews the right of pasturage. The foreman in revenge poisons the spring and the girl drinking of the water by chance is poisoned. The guilty person is discovered and tarred and feathered. The girl recovers and all is well.

DODGING MATRIMONY (Oct. 22).—A comedy with many laughable situations. Returning home late one night Brooks is soundly berated by his wife, who is something of a termagant. Later receiving word from a lawyer that his brother has died, he determines to make use of the fact to free himself of his wife and asks his friends to tell her that he has been drowned on a fishing trip. And then—complications.

THE DEATH SONG (Oct. 23).—A powerful story of love and jealousy, faithfulness and treachery, most ably acted and effectively scened. A young married man holding a good position is injured by an accident and rendered incapable of work for a long time. His money gives out and want knocks at the door. His wife goes to her former music teacher for advice and finds a well-known composer there. Hearing her voice he advises her to go upon the stage in his company. She does so, but only after the husband has exacted an oath that she will always be true to him. Her voice wins her fame and the composer falls in love with her, but she repulses him because of her oath. Her husband jealous to see her name and that of the composer constantly united in the newspapers determines to seek her and see how things are for himself. Events are thus precipitated in a most dramatic way.

HONFLEUR—AN OLD COAST TOWN OF NORTHERN FRANCE (Oct. 24).—A delightful visit to a picturesque old Norman town and its beautiful environs. Honfleur sits by the sea and dreams of her ancient glories.

BREEDING TROUT BY THE MILLION (Oct. 24).—A very interesting film which should be seen by every angler, sportsman and nature lover. Showing the artificial fertilization of the eggs, the placing of them in pure running water, the fry leaving the egg and the various stages of growth.

GYPSY LOVE (Oct. 25).—A tale of untamed passion and ruthless determination to win a lover at any cost. The characters are gypsies. The son of the gypsy chief loves a girl of the camp. His father opposes the match because the girl has no dowry. The owner of the property on which the gypsy camp is located visits the gypsies and giving the girl money invites her to his house. She accepts the invitation, but betrays the laws of hospitality and commits crime in order to get the money she needs before she can marry her lover. The crime is discovered and her lover wrongfully accused. To save him she confesses and pays the penalty.

BILL'S CAREER AS A BUTLER (Oct. 13).—When tired Bill came upon a suit of clothes on the bank of the river he apparently did not realize that they belonged to somebody else. Accordingly he discarded his own disheveled garments, put on the suit of clothes, and hearing a wild shout of protest from the water set off hurriedly up the road. In the pocket of the suit, Bill found a note recommending the bearer as an expert butler. Bill went to the address given in the note, and readily procured a position. Dressed in the ornate clothes of a butler, Bill felt that earth could hold little more of grandeur for him. Gregory, he real applicant for the position, arrived in Bill's clothes and told Bill the story of his misfortune. Bill unsympathetically kicked him down the steps. It can hardly be said that Bill was an entire success as a butler. To begin with, he insisted on smoking his clay pipe while serving dinner. Also, Bill was not exactly a picture of grace and he had a mind above small details. For instance, if out of a dozen plates of soup he only dropped two he considered it a very fair average indeed. After a few incidents of a nerve-racking sort, the Melville family decided that Bill's services could be dispensed with. Then the Melville family departed to seek a less frenzied dinner in a restaurant, while Bill donned his new clothes, and departed for pastures new. Unfortunately Gregory, the disappointed applicant, was still lurking about the premises. When Bill sauntered forth Gregory recognized the clothes and had Bill arrested. After that to Bill's sorrowful amazement Gregory pulled a large roll of bills from an unsuspected pocket of the suit and set off to explain matters to the Melvilles while Bill was marched protestingly to the station house.

THE FAMILY'S HONOR (Oct. 14).—Lieutenant Adams, U. S. A., on special duty in Cuba in the fall of 1897 fell deeply in love with Alva Bellina, daughter of General Bellina of the Spanish army. Shortly after the war broke out in 1898, General Bellina was killed in action. Jose, his son, Alva's twin brother, was at his father's side when he fell. Just before his death the general gave Jose important dispatches to be delivered to another division of the Spanish army. The death of his father paralyzed Jose with terror. A wild impulse for flight seized him and flinging to the winds all thoughts of the honor which had always been attached to the Bellina name, he fled from the field, crept to his home, divested himself of the uniform and put on civilian's clothes. Alva knocked on his door as he finished dressing. Ashamed to face her, Jose escaped by the window and Alva entering found the uniform and the dispatches General Bellina had given to Jose. Realizing the situation, Alva decided to redeem the honor her brother had forfeited. Accordingly she dressed herself in his uniform, placed the dispatches in an inside pocket and set out for the distant Spanish camp. On the way she was intercepted by American soldiers, fired at and seriously wounded. In a fainting condition she was taken before their commanding officer, Lieutenant Adams, who after continued questioning at length discovered her identity. Alva, feeling that her brother's honor was hopelessly lost, now that she had failed in her mission, fainted away. A moment later shots were heard outside and some time afterward the body of a Spaniard was brought into the tent. It was Jose. He had discovered his sister's sacrifice, and had taken the only means in his power to relieve her of her responsibility. With his arm about the weeping girl, Adams promised her that Jose should have a soldier's funeral and that the blot upon their name should be forgotten.

THE WIDOW'S SUITORS (Oct. 15).—The widow Black was the proprietress of Centretown's most successful restaurant. Silas Spivens and Bill Doaks were among the most arduous suitors for the hand of the fascinating Mrs. Black, who did not seem to be particularly impressed by either of them. Jim Grimes had a reputation about town for possessing plenty of hard common sense, and so it happened that Silas and Bill went to him separately for advice as to the most practicable way to win the widow. Jim thought a moment, and then suggested that they make Mrs. Black jealous by taking other girls to her restaurant. In the course of the next week, Silas and Bill divided their time between glaring at each other and [illegible] enormous checks to Mrs. Black, who became properly heart-broken. One evening Mrs. Black asked the delighted Silas to call on her. He went to the Black house, followed ten minutes later by Bill, who had also received an invitation.

Mrs. Black entertained Silas in the parlor and Bill in the sitting-room. To the fervid protestations of both swains, she would make no other reply than to make an appointment with them at the church steps at ten o'clock the next day.

Ten o'clock found Bill and Silas on the church steps staring at each other with enraged eyes. A few moments later Mrs. Black came out of the church on the arm of Jim Grimes.

THE FOREMAN'S TREACHERY (Special—2 Reels—Oct. 17).—Old Lloyd cared for only three things in all the world—his secret hoard of bright gold pieces, his daughter, Anna, and his half witted son, Elias. Anna, his daughter, loved and was loved by David Llewellyn, a workman in a nearby copper mine. This mine was owned by a Mr. Lewis, and was apparently worthless. In fact it was an open secret that Mr. Lewis was quite willing to sell it for a thousand pounds. One day Griffith, the mining foreman, discovered an unsuspected and remarkably rich vein of ore at a little distance from the shaft of the mine. He concealed his discovery with a mass of loose rubbish and instantly set his wits to work to discover some means of raising the thousand pounds necessary for the purchase of the mine. At about this time old Lloyd decided to transfer his money from the hole in the floor of his living-room to the ruins of an abbey near the town. He buried it near the abbey well, and to insure it against casual discovery assumed the conventional vestments of a ghost and severely frightened several late wayfarers who chanced to pass near the abbey. Griffith heard the rumor of the abbey ghost in the village and after a little investigation discovered the true meaning of the apparition. One night, shortly after old Lloyd had emphatically refused to give Anna to David, Griffith confronted the old man, discovered the location of the treasure, and in the struggle which followed, pushed old Lloyd into the well, killing him instantly. A tobacco pouch accidentally dropped by David caught Griffith's eye, and he placed it on the trampled turf near the well. The next day David happened in the vein Griffith had discovered. He escaped from the foreman and his two attendants by a nerve-racking ride on an ore car and arrived in town just in time to be arrested for old Lloyd's murder. When things looked darkest, with every shred of testimony pointing to him as the criminal, David was unexpectedly freed by the silent testimony of Anna's half-witted brother. Griffith, fleeing from the just vengeance of David, was blown to pieces by a tremendous blast and David returned to marry Anna and to be made foreman of the mine by the grateful Mr. Lewis.

TWICE RESCUED (Oct. 18).—Mrs. Gray approved very highly of Easton. Easton was a nice young man. He had plenty of money, a kind and affectionate disposition and was always very polite to Mrs. Gray. Altogether, Mrs. Gray felt certain that he would make an ideal husband for Betty. One day while the Grays were at their summer cottage Betty went in swimming with several other girls. She walked out until she could hardly touch bottom with her toes, lost her balance, fell and immediately commenced to scream. Easton, who was on the beach, changed color and half turned away. He said later that he was looking for a boat. However that may be, the fact remains that a muscular young chap dashed into the water while Easton was still hesitating, seized Betty rudely by the hair and carried her out of the water. Betty, still weak with fright and full of water, thought the young man was the most beautiful thing she had ever seen and told him as much in a choked, husky voice. The young man, whose name was Alec, realized at once that Betty was going to mean a great deal to him. He played tennis with her and took her rowing and did all the silly things people do at summer resorts, until one day he discovered that she was engaged to Easton. Then he refused to have anything more to do with her. Betty was highly vexed. She had never thought of her engagement to Easton as anything but a joke anyway and she thought it was highly unreasonable of Alec to be so nasty and conventional about it. To add to her displeasures, her mother urged Easton to renew his attacks. Betty went out rowing to escape him. She lost her oars and came within an ace of being run down by a large steamer. Alec, putting out hastily in a motorboat, seized her in the very nick of time. Since it seemed evident that Betty would come to an untimely end unless Alec were always on hand to save her, they realized that the best thing they could do was to get married.

GEORGE KLEINE.

MISGOTTEN GAINS (2 parts—Sept. 30).—George Briggs and Jim Everet were fashionable members of society by day and thugs by night. One evening, learning that a certain villa would be deserted, the two thieves crept into the house and rifled it. Among the papers which George discovered while searching for money, was a letter from old Captain Rawley to his friend, complaining about the responsibilities involved in raising his daughter Helen, and suggesting his willingness to allow her to entertain a marriage proposal, provided the chap had a title. He, the captain, would provide a handsome dowry. George took the next train to the little town. He waited in the park until a carriage containing Helen and her father passed. Then, throwing himself in its path, he managed to scrape acquaintance without doing serious damage to himself or his clothes. Meanwhile, Helen had a sweetheart in Lieutenant Graham, a young naval officer. The latter called often and the captain sat with the young folks until he fell asleep. On one such occasion Graham found his voice and Helen found herself in his arms. Just then the captain awoke. Also, the captain was mightily wroth and drove the lieutenant from his home, threatening dire things. Hence, when the captain heard that George Briggs was a titled nobleman, George had an easy time of it. Time passed and finally Graham, away on a cruise, got a letter from Helen, telling of her approaching marriage and asking him to save her. Also, Helen suggested that there seemed something strange about George and asked Graham to investigate. Obtaining the services of a private detective as soon as he reached port, Graham was soon in possession of the entire history. He confronted George in the latter's room and promised immunity if he would cease his attentions to Helen. George laughed at him and in the ensuing fight Graham was suddenly seized from behind and stunned. They carried him to a deserted spot in the woods and left him to die. However, Graham was discovered by peasants and nursed back to health and understanding. Then, on the wedding night, with two policemen, Graham stepped into the room and effected the capture of George in the nick of time. Thus the captain found a real protector for his daughter.

THE FLOWER OF DESTINY (2 parts—Oct. 7).—Count Ferdinand and his beautiful countess lived alone in the great castle overhanging the sea. Unbeknown even to himself, Anton, a pretty boy page employed by the count, fell boyishly in love with the countess. As a token of his affection, each day the lad placed a white carnation on the window-sill. Discovering the flower in the window one afternoon, the count upbraided his wife for her lack of faithfulness. The following day, coming suddenly around a corner, the count was electrified to see Anton gently placing his little token of love in its usual place. Insanely angry, the count sprang upon the boy and beat him to death. There was sorrow in the home of the widowed mother and sister when the little body was roughly tossed across the bed. Marguerita, the sister, took a solemn oath to be avenged for the cruel murder. Quite accidentally, the count met pretty Marguerita and in the days that followed she let him woo her, until she found chance to ask that she be let into his home as page. So she cut her long hair and donned the uniform of a boy page and entered the home of her brother's murderer. Time passed and Marguerita allowed no opportunity to slip by that did not bring her closer to vengeance. The countess by degrees and against her will, grew to love the handsome boy, and the count could neither eat nor sleep for thought of her. And then came the day of the vengeance. She plotted with the count to destroy the countess by poison, promising to marry him on the death of his wife. Deeply remorseful, but determined, the count dropped the deadly acid in her wine. Then Marguerita, promising to marry the countess should she dispose of her husband, told her of the poison in the wine. The countess, simulating sickness at the table, retired to her room. The count, convinced that she was dying, influenced by Marguerita, went to her bedside, knife in hand, to end her misery. But before he could strike, the blade of the countess sunk into him and the murderous villain dropped dead at her feet. Slipping from the tragic scene, Marguerita changed into woman's clothes, faced the countess, and revealed her identity.

LUBIN.

FATHER'S CHOICE (Oct. 20).—Bob Watt's father wants him to marry Mabel Dean, but Bob can't see her, because he is strong for Ruth Harris. Pa Watt tries to break up the combination by offering Ruth a diamond ring in exchange for the gold seal ring Bob has given as a love token. Bob hiding behind a tree sees the negotiation and motions Ruth to take the diamond, which she does. A week later Pa Watt is threatened with a lawsuit by Ruth, for breach of promise. The ring being the prime exhibit, then he switches and wants Bob to marry Ruth. The boy, however, also switches and pretends a liking for Mabel. It takes a $25,000 check for Ruth to settle the tangle. Father thinks he has done a pretty good day's work, as the money is still in the family. Ruth and Bob are satisfied and Mabel has to be content with her second best boy.

ALL ON ACCOUNT OF DAISY (Oct. 20).—Bill Thomas, a young happily married man, meets Tom Jones on the street one day and buys a ticket for a chance on a dog. The drawing takes place, Bill wins the dog and Tom informs him by letter. Bill's wife, who is a little jealous, is present when the letter arrives and as Bill hurriedly goes out without explaining to her, she becomes suspicious. As Bill has left the letter in his house coat, which she finds after his departure lying on the floor, she notices that the hanger is broken and starts to fix it, when she discovers the letter in the pocket. She reads the letter and at once makes up her mind that Bill is false to her. She follows him and sees him talking to Mrs. Tom Jones, while Tom is inside of the house getting the dog for Bill to take home. Enraged she, rushes home and smashes things up. Bill in the meantime has gotten the dog and is trying to feed it everything that he can buy on the way home. The house is a wreck and Mrs. Bill rushes off to her mother's, leaving a note on the table. Bill arrives at the house and thinking to surprise his wife enters quietly, but is astonished at the condition of things. He finds the note on the table and leaving the dog rushes off to find his wife. Arriving at the mother's, Bill is set upon by the wife and mother, and he has to retreat to save himself further punishment. They follow him and when they all arrive at Bill'h house the affair is satisfactorily explained and the little dog, Daisy, is the favorite of all.

HER FIRST OFFENSE (Oct. 21).—Janet, John and Violet are children of the Widow Smith. John is taken ill and the doctor decides he has tuberculosis, and that only a change of climate will help. Janet, who is a stenographer in the office of George Wheeler, a wealthy broker, determines to forge his name to a check to secure means to send her brother away. She forges the check and takes the money home and says that her employer has given it as a loan. In the meantime, the broker discovers the forgery and has Janet arrested. Her mother and brother are heartbroken and the mother leaves John alone with his baby sister, while she goes to seek aid for Janet. John struggles out of bed with the help of the little sister and they go out to find the broker and intercede for Janet. On their arrival at the office John succumbs to weariness and falls half fainting on the couch in the outer room. Little Violet enters the broker's private office alone, just as he is gazing at the picture of his own loved and lost baby. Violet wins his heart, he listens to her story, which is later corroborated by John. He sends them home happy in the assurance that their sister shall return to them. He withdraws the charge against Janet, gives John money to go away and with a last lingering kiss for little Violet, leaves the now happy family.

THE EVIL EYE (Oct. 23, 2 parts, Special).—Senor Don Alma Bendadoso, who has been away from his native home, has sent word to his adherents that he is returning to his castle for the purpose of teaching the true word of God. One of the local newspapers printed a warning to the natives, who are all superstitious to a terrible degree. In his boyhood, the don, while out hunting, met with an enraged mountain lion, which he held with his eye and escaped unharmed, the people then giving him the title of "He of the Evil Eye," and fearing him from that day forward, therefore the unjust title held fast to this quiet man of love. Upon his arrival the people were warned by one Don Immonco Superstisioso and his daughter's sweetheart, Ocioso Ignoranto. The girl, Sobre Superstisioso, wishing to know more about the man with the evil eye, fled the house to the thick of the fray and there met the cursed one, who fascinated her, much to the chagrin and envy of the one who has been selected for her. Later the girl cultivated the acquaintance of Alma, and finds him to be a master, and superior in every way to those with whom she had come in contact, and respect and admiration slowly ripened into love, which was returned by he of the evil eye. Her father demanded that she marry Ocioso Ignoranto, and she finally declared herself by saying that one month hence she will marry him who is most worthy. Senor Don Alma Bendadoso rises clear from the darkness of ignorance to that lightness of reason and understanding, enveloping the girl with the halo from his own soul.

THE MAN IN THE HAMPER (Oct. 24).—Jane Ormond, living in a big city, has had an affair with an unscrupulous man named Jackson. She meets and falls in love with Phil Macklin, a western ranch owner. Later she throws Jackson over for good and goes West to marry Macklin, who knows of Jane's affair with Jackson. Out West Jane takes up her life with Macklin and is tremendously happy in his love and the esteem and regard of his friends. Later Macklin finds his wife working on baby clothes and their mutual love deepens. About this time Macklin runs across Jackson in one of the western saloons and a fight is narrowly averted when he makes a slurring remark about Jane. Jackson becomes drunk and kills a man in a gambling brawl. He escapes, but is followed later by the sheriff and his posse. Macklin is out on the ranch when Jackson, exhausted and badly wounded, takes refuge in the Macklin ranch. He gets into Jane's bedroom and locks the door, pocketing the key. A big hamper is within easy reach and he hides in it, covering Jane through the flap opening with his revolver. Macklin returns and looks for Jane. At her bedroom door he is refused entrance, Jane fearing he will be shot. He accepts her excuse of a sick headache and is leaving, when he finds some playing cards on the floor. His jealousy is aroused and he demands admittance, which she half faintingly refuses. Macklin starts to break down

MOTHER LOVE (Oct. 25).—Bob Wisner, home from college, falls in love with Mary, the nurse his mother has for his baby brother. Finally they marry, deciding to keep it a secret until he has finished his college work, and then, when he can go into his business with his father, take the chances of telling it. Otherwise, Bob might be cast out. He goes back to college and Mary has a secret which she tries in vain to cover. Finally her illness compels Bob's mother, against Mary's wishes, to call in a doctor. Then the truth comes out, but Mary won't admit any marriage, much as it hurts her to be thought a bad woman. The mother decides she cannot keep her and won't even let her kiss the baby good bye. Mary goes home to the comfort of her mother's arms and from there sends for Bob. He hurries back and hears the truth. Bob goes to his parents and tells them the truth. They are horrified and insistent that he shall not go back to his wife. Bob, adamant in his resolve, is banished. He returns to tell Mary the cruel news, while his parents sadly put on the baby brother a pair of new booties that Papa Wisner had brought home that night. In their sadness over Bob the booties are a relief. Father on one side and mother on the other, each put on a boot and reverently kiss them. The days pass, a new baby comes into Bob's little family and brings joy. His baby brother is taken ill and dies, and has been buried when Bob gets the news. Both he and Mary are greatly agitated over the sad news and determine to go to the stricken parents and try the effect of their baby. Meanwhile we see the two bedrooms, with the wall between. Mother on her side, is brooding over one little bootie, while father, in his bedroom, is brooding over the other. They see a vision between them in the wall space of the scene where they put on the booties and it breaks them down. Bob and Mary enter the nursery and put their baby in the lonely crib. Father and mother are both actuated by the same impulse to leave their bedrooms for the nursery, bootie in hand. Bob and Mary hear them coming and leaving the baby in the crib, hide.

The parents enter and are mystified and dazed at finding a child in the crib. The younger folks come out from behind the curtains and gain forgiveness. Then mother and father after a moment's hesitation, decide that the booties belong on the new baby and suit the action to the thought.

VITAGRAPH.

THE WHITE FEATHER (Oct. 20).—Through an accident in his youth, Grant Whitney is inwardly a coward, though he has outwardly kept this a secret from all, including his fiancée, Alice Lee, a Western girl. Grant goes to visit Alice in her western home, and on the first morning of his visit, a horseback ride is suggested. Steve, Mr. Lee's foreman, in love with Alice, is somewhat prejudiced against this "tenderfoot" from New York, and gives him a poorly broken horse. Grant, losing control of the horse, is flung to the ground and though only slightly shocked, is overpowered with the memory of the accident of his youth and faints away. He is taken to his room and put upon his bed. Alice being sent away on an errand, sends him a note with some flowers enclosed, saying, "Just a token of my love." She puts it under his door and goes away. Sometime later, Steve, coming upstairs, sees the note and taking it, reads it. He replaces the flowers with a white feather, which decidedly changes the meaning of her message. Grant, finding the note, is affected in a different way from what Steve had expected. It arouses his anger and inspires him with courage. Out into the corral he goes, and taking the same horse which had thrown him in the morning, rides out far into the hills to conquer his irresponsible fear. Steve, moved to admiration for his rival's determination, and stricken with remorse, rides out to help him. All night he pursues, but cannot find Grant. Next morning, Grant, returning to the ranch, comes upon Steve, who, with a broken leg is lying under his horse which had fallen dead. The two return together, good friends. They are met by Alice, who hails Grant as her brave and fearless hero.

LUELLA'S LOVE STORY (Oct. 21).—To her mother's great sorrow, Luella has grown to be an old maid. She has never had a lover. The mother, old and ill, is not willing to die and leave her alone. Luella, realizing her mother's illness to be serious, plans to make her last days happy. She goes to another village, visits her cousin Jane to further a plan which she has concocted. She writes her mother that she has finally found a [illegible] her choice and is going to be married. The [illegible] overjoyed at the news, but Hank, who is [illegible]'s neighbor, and who loves Luella, [illegible]scious of it until he reads of her approaching marriage, is astonished at the news and becomes sullen.

He writes Luella, telling her she ought to be ashamed of herself to "carry on" with a city fellow instead of being home with her sick mother, but Luella remains at her cousin's and keeps up the deception. When Luella returns home, her mother dies happy, believing Luella will wed, but the truth is found out by Hank. Luella confesses that there has been no man, she only wrote her mother of her marriage, in order to make her last days happy. Hank, realizing what a fine woman she is, proposes, is accepted, and Luella now has a life protector.

SLEUTHS UNAWARES (Oct. 22).—Sandy and Shorty, more ragged than ever, but still more genial of mind than ever, drift into town and do a service to a poor landlady as well as to their country. The sheriff of the county receives word that there is a convict some place in the surrounding country, who for some time past has been a guest of the state penitentiary and who has rudely left. In a boarding house nearby to the sheriff there is being unceremoniously ejected an actor who cannot pay his bills. His trunk is taken care of by the landlady. Sandy and Shorty, who have assisted in the dismissal of the unfortunate player, espy the contents of the trunk, to which they are made welcome by the irate landlady. Within it are all manner of gorgeous raiment and going to a secreted spot, Sandy and Shorty discard their old, and put on the new attire. During the course of their rambles in the next few hours, they come upon the cool waters of the village reservoir. The day is hot and they are tired. They hesitate a moment, and then disrobing, plunge into the pleasant depths. While they are thus disporting themselves, their attention is suddenly called to a fellow clad in the garb of a convict, stealing all of their "glad rags." Arrayed only in barrels, Sandy and Shorty give chase and catch the fugitive. In due course of time, to their amazement, they are handed out the reward which was offered for the capture of the convict. With true satisfaction, they don their old clothes happily and contentedly, no worse for their adventure.

LOW CASTE BURMESE (Oct. 22).—Taking us on a sight seeing tour of one of the ancient and most curious cities of India.

THE DOCTOR'S SECRET (Oct. 23).—After making some wonderful discoveries in regard to the cure of cancer, Dr. Bergmann, who is suffering from heart disease, fears that he will not live to see the fruits of his invention. He wishes to leave the secret to his son, Hans, a boy of six, whom he hopes will be a doctor. He confides the general idea to his friend, Dr. Von Mertz, but does not tell him the details. At once he becomes possessed with an unholy desire to learn the secret. Bergmann has fallen asleep on the sofa before the fire. Von Mertz enters the room, goes to the drawer, takes out the papers and begins to make notes. Bergmann awakes, discovers him, and rushes at him in a fury. The excitement is too much for his heart and he sinks to the floor, as Von Mertz thinks, dead. He steals the manuscript and goes for assistance. While he is gone, Oscar, an old servalt, watches his master. Bergmann revives and has sufficient strength to write a few lines which he encloses in a letter already written to his son to be given him when he comes of age. This he gives to Oscar to give to his lawyer, warning him to be careful of Von Mertz. He then sinks back, dead indeed. Von Mertz adopts Hans and brings him up as his own, and shortly after accepts a professorship in America and goes there with his little daughter Elsa and Hans Bergmann. Oscar gives the letter to Stoltz, the lawyer, who is rather puzzled. By means of Bergmann's discovery, Von Mertz wins fame and fortune, but is always haunted by remorse for his past. Hans becomes betrothed to Elsa on his 21st birthday. That night Stoltz arrives in America with old Oscar, and gives the letter which tells of Von Mertz's crime into Hans' hands. Von Mertz overhears him read it, and, coming out of his room, confesses his crime and begs for mercy. The shock of the discovery is too much for him, and he expires. Elsa rushes into the room. Hans realizes that his highest duty is to the woman he is going to make his wife, and so resolves to bury forever her father's secret.

ON THEIR WEDDING EVE (Oct. 24).—On the very eve of their wedding, Edna Morvell and George Kendrick quarrel and, very much peeved, separate from each other. To satisfy their imaginary wrongs, Edna goes to her room and George hurries home, where they tear up each other's love letters. In foraging over these treasured missives, she comes across George's photograph, which she is about to destroy, but instead, places tenderly in the bosom of her dress. George happens to see her picture and he lovingly places it in the breast pocket of his coat. To forget each other they decide to go abroad, each taking a different route. All through their travels, in Japan, China, Egypt and Italy, amid all the strange surroundings of these strange countries, they carry each other's photograph. They are frequently reminded of each other and cannot refrain from thinking of how foolish they were, gazing affectionately upon the picture which each dearly admires. They both visit Bombay at the same time, and saunter off into the beautiful gardens of that East Indian paradise. They take different paths, which conjoin at the end of a beautiful grove. They are seen sauntering along the separate walks, looking wistfully at the photographs. At the termination of the two lanes they suddenly come face to face with a bump. Their surprise is mutual and it is some moments before either can speak to the other. When they recover themselves, they both see their photographs in their hands. No explanations are necessary to understand their feelings toward each other. Then and there they immediately confess their differences as childish pique, which is soon kissed away in each others' embrace. Their wedding day is not far off.

THE NEXT GENERATION (Oct. 25).—Vincent Strong, who is acknowledged to be the greatest living ship designer, is terribly jealous of his reputation. He is considerably annoyed when his brother apprentices his son to him and asks him to make him as great as himself. None the less he takes Carl into his office and gives him every opportunity to learn. Before long Vincent Strong realizes that Carl is destined to be as great a craftsman as himself, if not greater. He becomes uncontrollably jealous, the more so when he realizes that Janice Barnes, the daughter of the president of the S. S. Company, and with whom he is in love, prefers Carl to himself. So egotistic is he that he neglects his invalid wife, who dies while he is courting Janice at a dance. Carl sees Strong's design for a new ship which Barnes is building. He notices that it contains a serious flaw. He tells his uncle of this and shows how the mistake may be covered. Strong tells him that he is an ingrate and impudent upstart. The ship is built in accord with the faulty drawings. Carl rushes into a directors' meeting of the company and tells of what he has discovered. But they will not heed his warning. The ship is launched and Vincent sails with her on her maiden trip. Barnes calls another directors' meeting and Carl tells them that the ship will never reach port, convincing them that he is right. With drawn looks the white-haired directors sit around the office table and—thinking of the thousands of passengers who will perish, all because one man could not master his egotism, and they were blind to the truth. When three days out a terrific tremor is felt by those on the vessel and she founders quickly before all the life-boats can be gotten away from her, taking the panic-stricken passengers down with it, including Vincent Strong. At that very moment Carl is signing a contract to become head ship-designer for the company, and he obtains consent to marry Janice. The next generation has triumphed.

SELIG.

THE BRIDGE OF SHADOWS (2 parts—Oct. 13).—Francis Edmunds, a middle-aged banker, is perturbed over the newspaper headlines, "Flood Losses in Ohio, That Will Hopelessly Involve Insurance Companies." He proposes to take into his confidence the new bookkeeper, Edward Warren, and begin a vigorous campaigning in tracing the risks that he feels have been greatly exaggerated by the press. Night falls as they are still busy with the task, and he orders his bookkeeper to get a bite and return quickly. The latter leaves the office, and Edmunds is seized with illness. He scrawls a note asking the bookkeeper to have the data of the flood risks ready for him later, and he encloses the key to his private office. He then leaves without locking the safe. The night watchman comes along, and, observing the office in disorder and the safe door ajar, becomes suspicious. By the time the bookkeeper returns the night watchman is more suspicious. Edmunds, on returning to his home, rapidly becomes worse, and upon receipt of a telegram from his company, telling him "the floods have wiped us out," receives such a shock that it precipitates his death.

Warren, the new bookkeeper, unaware of the condition of affairs in his master's house, tears up the note, takes the key, and then drags down all the documentary evidence in sight concerning their "risks." As he swings open the safe door, the night watchman, who has summoned a patrolman, pounces upon him as a thief. Warren protests and calls up on the phone. This is futile, for death has dulled the ears of his employer, and he has destroyed his note of instruction. He is helpless, but as he has taken nothing, the judge dismisses his case. This dismissal, however, is merely a sign for unending persecution on the part of the police. With the death of Edmunds disasters descend upon his house, his well beloved daughter, Blanche, steps from affluence down to poverty. She is not only broken-hearted over the loss of her father, but pinched by penury, so that she is forced to battle for bread. There is no work for the "unconvicted," so that Warren stumbles along, shadowed by the police, and is refused one position after another. In the interim, Blanche Edmunds has great difficulty in bringing herself to the changed conditions. She finds that in her unfortunate situation she is left quite alone. The fleeing months find Edward in the bread line, but thrown out by the police. He seeks the friendly shadows of a bridge, looks over into the dark, welcoming water. A woman, approaching, observes his action, and weak and wretched as she is, saves the desperate man from himself. Then the pitiful pair limp back toward the city.

The night scene shows a lunch-wagon by the side of the street. Blanche comes in, supporting Edward, and spends her last dime that they may have [illegible] then trudge on their way and pass the [illegible] She meets two of her erstwhile friends, and they snub her. The wretched pair seek a bench in the park. Eventually they fall in with gypsies, and these wanderers take them in. An officer has a fight with a band of roughs, when Warren, who has now grown strong, rescues him and wins the gratitude of the bluecoats. He at last is left in peace; in fact, he gets a job through the efforts of the minion of the law whose life he saved. The gypsy queen finds a lost child and with Blanche starts to find its parents. The little girl proves to be the daughter of a distinguished jurist and through her humane act Blanche finds a home. Eventually, Warren, now a new man, finds her, and the judge recognizes him as the "unconvicted man" in a celebrated case that once came under his jurisdiction. Blanche is then identified as the daughter of the millionaire whose fortunes were supposed to have been swept away by the Dayton floods. The insurance company has won in its case and was not bound by "the act of Providence" in substituting "flood for fire"—but the heiress of the Edmunds restored fortune cannot be found. Through the judge, Blanche has her identity established, comes into her fortune, and does not forget the friend that she found in her adversity.

THE SILVER GRINDSTONE (Oct. 14).—David Stratton, the Camp Hope drunkard, has sunk so low he will do almost anything for a slug of fusil oil. His poor wife bends by day over a washtub to secure a little money which he frequently coaxes from her to spend by night in the saloon. About the only work that the bibulous Stratton will essay, is sharpening the tools of the miners, who reward him with drinks at the bar. One day, Slick Slade, a gambler, shoots Harry Custer, a miner, and in the melee which ensues, Slade rushes out of the rear door of the saloon, knocks Dave over his grindstone breaking this only implement of his occupation. Dave has been accumulating thirst for at least thirty minutes and is very much wroth over the destruction of further opportunity to satisfy it, picks up the broken pieces of the grindstone and is about to hurl them through the saloon window at the group lined up along the counter of the thirst parlor, when he hesitates and finds that it is rich in traces of silver. Some flash of the old keenness comes into his sodden cranium and he starts a sober search to find where that grindstone came from. He ascertains that the saloonkeeper bought it from a farmer, who made it by hand. Dave seeks out the husbandman, strikes a silver bonanza, and handles it right. He returns to hopeless old Camp Hope, finds things in a bad way; but, makes everybody happy in the boom of the new golconda, Camp Grindstone. Stratton becomes wealthy and likewise a sober and enterprising citizen.

Twelve years after, Slick Slade slinks back and tries to rob Mayor Stratton's house, but is balked by the timely interference of Custer, whom he had shot years before. The case comes before Senator Stratton, who at first concludes to send Slade to prison, but relents, furnishes him with money and sends him on his way a free man, rewarding Custer even more generously.

AS A FATHER SPARETH HIS SON (Oct. 15).—Stern Dr. May through an erroneous idea of what constitutes fraternal duty, endeavors to force his son into a profession for which he has absolutely no aptitude. This boy, who has rather a gay disposition, has some ideas of his own, and as his father threatens with disinheritance if he does not study medicine, he goes out into the world to make his own way. His father, set in his ideas, is so irritated that he throws all sorts of obstacles in his way, and as a result the boy is ousted from various jobs. He has married, but as he goes drifting into poverty, he grows desperate. As a last resource, he enlists in the army and is sent West, leaving his wife destitute. Unhappily, he is in the company of an officer who was at one time his rival in love, who now proceeds to persecute him, as an officer can a subordinate. While in the guardhouse on a trumped-up charge, he receives a letter from the landlady of the boarding house where he left his wife, informing him of her serious illness. He asks for a furlough, but is refused. He escapes from confinement, and comes home, but too late. He drifts rapidly downward, to bad ways and worse, and is shot in a saloon brawl. His father is called to treat him—there is recognition and reconciliation before he dies, but the father realizes his mistake in the direction of youth.

THE GOLDEN CLOUD (Oct. 16).—Bob Walton is apparently a very prosperous young broker, but when he asks Edith Gates to become his wife, her father is a bit dubious about his finances and reluctantly gives consent. Considering the fact that he is a broker, Bob is very careful. As he has begun to build a home for himself and his prospective bride, he does not deem it advisable to act upon the suggestion of his brother, and buy stock in the Golden Cloud mine. Troubles, however, never come singly. He has discussed the proposition with Edith Gates and discarded her advice, and she has left, when he receives a telegram that the bank holding a large deposit of his father has failed and left that aged man prostrated, and fast following it comes an appeal from his old mother. He hurriedly calls Edith up, summarizes her the bad news, giving no explanation beyond the fact that he will be away for a few days. She determines to catch him at his office, but arrives there too late. On the desk she finds the message from his mother and immediately understands the sacrifice he is making to save his parents from distress. She looks for the mining tip on the Golden Cloud, that she had seen at a glance on her previous visit, and finally finds it in the waste-basket. She is something of a speculator herself. She hies to her father's office and demands $10,000, to be used in a certain investment. As she has been accustomed to having her own way, she gets it. After a few days Bob returns and requests that the marriage be postponed because of his parents' troubles, to which fact, she now understanding, readily assents. Family cares not only harass Bob, but the market seems conspiring against him; he is hard hit and growing desperate. He picks up the paper and reads of the phenomenal rise in Golden Cloud securities and casts it away from him in disgust. The picture flashes to Edith's home, showing her reading the same paper, but she clasps the paper in ecstatic fashion, rushes to the phone and shouts to her brokers, "Sell! Sell! Sell!" The next day dawns dark for Bob, until Edith and her father invade his office and she slips into his hand a large official envelope crowded with important money, remarking "I stole your tip and invested in the Golden Cloud." He opens the envelope, finds a draft for $100,000 and the crumpled tip on the Golden Cloud.

THE ABDUCTION OF PINKIE (Oct. 16).—A canine comedy.

THE WOMAN OF THE MOUNTAINS (Oct. 17).—"In thirty minutes Granite Mountain will crumble," echoed the deep determined voice of Brice, the Trust agent, who broke the silence of the gulch, speaking to Slocum, the treacherous employee of the Independent Power Co., who had come to the way of doing disreputable business by the cash route. Slocum fumbled with the electrical mechanism as his hands trembled in making the final connection of the switch, which would throw into service the daily wire to discharge masses of hidden dynamite placed in the tunnel of the Independent for the purposes of destroying great works, to advantage a rival. Far up in the mountains, in the Devil's Chute, clinging to a cable car with 1,800 feet of drop, to the scene of this operation, is Stella, praying that she may arrive in time to prevent the catastrophe while Herbert, Brice's rival for her hand, is being rapidly lowered by a single rope, down the rock-ribbed canyon in an effort to join her in a dramatic dash to prevent the culmination of the conspiracy that will destroy the work of years, and be far reaching in affecting the life and fortunes of all the workmen in that neighborhood. This terrific, sensational slide, and the fact that the girl saved the day and prevented the destruction, make remarkable material for a thrilling pictorial play.

DISHWASH DICK'S COUNTERFEIT (Oct. 21).—A natty individual, known as Dishwash Dick, obtains a job by mail-order in the grub department of the "N. Y. Ranch." On the same train that he takes for the wilds, is Dick Mason, whose father owns the ranch, but who is unknown and has never been West. The cowboys who are hilarious and likewise impetuous over the arrival of the new knight of the kitchen, go to the train and lay violent hands on young Mason, as a candidate for the third degree; while the ranchman's daughter meets Dishwash Dick, and mistaking him for their guest, drives him home in her runabout, and he is installed in state as the honored visitor. In the interim, Dick Mason, is whirled about so fast that he has no time to explain his real status and has one awful time, between the perils of the kitchen and the trials and tribulations that the mischievous cowboys put upon him. The ranch people are stirred to their uttermost depths by the presence of cattle rustlers, and everybody rushes to the saddle to scour the range and bring the bad men to grass. This brings out the true colors of Dishwash Dick as a coward and poltroon and he is glad to let his horse run away toward the railway, while Dick Mason develops unexpected trepidity which wins him the esteem and regard of the cowboys; in fact, he settles several of the most truculent with neatness and dispatch that commands the highest regard of all. On the same reel with

SURF AND SUNSET ON THE INDIAN OCEAN (Oct. 21).—A superb Selig signature in the far East.

DOROTHY'S ADOPTION (Oct. 22).—Mrs. Lean, the wife of a wealthy banker, loses her child and will not be comforted. Unable to endure loneliness longer, she adopts little Dorothy, an orphan, and as her husband has opposed such a move she brings the child surreptitiously to the house while he is away. He returns home unexpectedly, goes to his library, unlocks the door of his private vault in order to deposit some very valuable jewels. At this moment, he hears childish laughter and rushes angrily out to investigate without stopping to close the door. Jennings, the butler (in reality a noted crook), has seen the gems and sneaks into the vault to look them over. The banker discovers his wife romping joyously with a little child, and insanely resenting the presence of the little one, orders her returned at once to the orphanage. Terrified at the thought, the little girl rushes away unnoticed, as the husband is remonstrating with his wife and hides herself in the library. Lean, after upbraiding his wife, bethinks him of the jewels and rushes back to the library, surprising Jennings in the vault. The banker is no physical match for the husky butler, who disarms him, overpowers him, and imprisons his master in a closet, rushing back into the vault to secure the gems. Little Dorothy is horrified over the situation, but dashes from her hiding-place, slams the vault door shut, and gives the combination a turn. Then she runs for Mrs. Lean, who comes with her, they release her husband and call the police. Jennings is securely trapped with the goods and little Dorothy's heroism and wit so profoundly impresses the banker, that he signs the articles of her adoption and she becomes a member of their household.

LIFE FOR LIFE (Oct. 23).—The Mayor of Lakeport purchases a pulmotor to revive persons apparently drowned, and installs it in the fire-engine house, subject to the call from any citizen—"first come first served." The news of this valuable adjunct for security by the waterside has scarcely gone around when Jimmie Higgins, a poor boy who goes in swimming and gets beyond his depth, is unconscious when dragged to the shore by his fellows. Their efforts to revive the boy being futile, a doctor who rushes to the rescue declares, "Nothing can save him but the pulmotor." One of the boys dashes off to the engine-house and informs Mike, in charge of the instrument. Coincident with this, several miles down the lake, Walter Greer, the son of the Mayor who was sailing a sloop with a party, is caught in a squall and Walter is caught under the sail. He is finally rescued by his companions, but seems to be drowned and in a state of unconsciousness is rushed to shore in a motor-boat. His father, well nigh distracted, goes to the phone and calls up the town, ordering the pulmotor sent at once. Mike in charge of the pulmotor, is starting to the aid of the Higgins call when he hears the telephone bell ring and recognizes the Mayor's voice commanding him to come to his summer home with the pulmotor. Although the Mayor insists upon his immediate service, Mike tells him that he is second in the line and must wait, and then bolts to the rescue of the poor Higgins boy. The Mayor drops the phone, jumps in his motor car and speeds for the engine-house. He sees the group on the beach, and, frantic with grief and fear, spurts into the crowd, demands that he have the pulmotor to minister to his own boy. The crowd grows ugly and threatening and the tensity of the scene is dramatic to a degree. Meanwhile, the doctor has succeeded in reviving Walter Greer through artificial respiration, and when the Mayor learns this, relieved of his anxiety, he comes to himself and is covered with shame at his action. He apologizes to Mike, the pulmotor man, and all concerned for his temper whetted by anxiety. Then he takes poor Mrs. Higgins and her recovered boy home in his automobile.

DESTINY OF THE SEA (Oct. 24).—Kenneth Greves and his wife, Elsie, have a summer home at the seaside, and the christening of their baby draws a brilliant social gathering, among others Constance Strong, just returned from Europe, who is on ald friend of the wife and who is prevailed upon to remain for several weeks. She is a beautiful woman, versed in the ways of the world and free from all minor faults; but there immediately arises between her and the husband a strange telepathic bond, commonly described as "affinity." As well-bred and self-respecting people, they vainly endeavor to hide their weakness, too plainly palpable to others. Elsie, however, wrapped up in her baby, is oblivious to all outside things even to forgetfulness of her husband that is almost neglect. He is thrown continually in the society of Constance and is too weak to resist the love that her presence radiates. A burning moment arrives when each acknowledges the ardent feeling for the other. John Greves, the father of the husband, an elderly but well preserved man, accidentally witnesses this scene, and having feelings of his own for the fair Constance, together with a great desire to save his son from the smirch of a scandal, asks her to marry him. She refuses and prepares to make a hasty departure for exile in Europe.

Elsie Greves has ever manifested a strange affection for the sea, having been born at sea, and the high tides often lure her down to the dangerous rocks. Her husband has observed this tendency and frequently warned her of the danger. She is a simple, trustful soul, and has never doubted her consort, nor does she for one moment dream of the sacrifice that Constance is making in her contemplated flight. The day after that lady's departure, which leaves Kenneth Greves alone in the bitter struggle, Elsie, his wife, by some strange call of the sea, goes down to meet the rising tides and they overcome her. Kenneth is brought to his sense of his loss by the shouts of fishermen, who come, bearing the dead form of his wife in their arms. The end of all this is problematical,—whether or not the husband follows destiny across the sea to claim one who is flying from him on the bosom of the ocean, or chooses to remain single and alone, steadfast to the memory of one whose life was lost in its depths—is the question that each observer can answer for himself.

KALEM.

THE DUMB MESSENGER (Oct. 20).—May, twenty years old, and Bessie, six years old, live with their grandfather, an old recluse and bookworm. May is invited to a dance by Jim, the ne'er-do-well son of Mrs. Heap, the housekeeper. May dislikes Jim and is not inclined to go, but her grandfather persuades her to accept the invitation. Bessie has made a pet of a white mouse and shows it to her grandfather who smiles absently and returns to his books up in the garret. While at the dance, May is insulted by a bully. Bob, a stranger, knocks the bully down. Jim, who fears the bully, is angry at the turn of affairs. May shows her contempt for him by accepting Bob's invitation to take her home. The two fall in love with each other. Mrs. Heap discovers the hiding place of the old man's gold. Filled with greed, she takes her son and the bully into her confidence. They plot to steel the money. May goes out with Bob the following night. During their absence, Jim and the bully overpower the old man. Bessie enters the room and is warned to keep silent. The little girl scrawls a note calling for help, pastes it on the back of the mouse which she then shoves into the mouth piece of a speaking tube leading to the lower part of the house. May returns home and sees the mouse peeking out of the tube. She pulls it out and finds the call for help. She summons Bob who is talking with a policeman and they return to the house. Jim and the bully are about to escape when captured by Bob and the officer. Bob releases the old man and then tells of his love for May. In gratitude, the grandfather gives his consent to their engagement.

A DAUGHTER OF THE UNDERWORLD (2 parts, Oct. 22).—Malva, a seventeen-year-old pursesnatcher, escapes from a pursuing policeman by dodging into the Rescue Mission. Services are being conducted by Deverill, a young minister. His sermon shows the girl the way to a new life. Malva's father and brother, Dave, plan to rob a store. Ulster, a sneakthief, overhears them and demands to be taken along. His request denied, the man becomes abusive and Dave knocks him down. In revenge, Ulster turns informer. Dave and his father find the police ready for them. Dave is arrested after a hard chase and struggle. The father escapes, although desperately wounded. The man staggers home and bursts in upon Malva. The girl runs to Deverill for assistance. The minister returns to the house with Malva just as the father dies. Deverill takes Malva to his home. His mother makes her a member of the household. Two years later, Dave is released and searches for his sister. Finding her happily located, he decides to blackmail her. The brother has learned of Ulster's treachery. Ulster has also discovered Malva's whereabouts and plans to rob the house. Dave, waiting in the library, hears a sound at the window. Ulster forces the window open and climbs into the room. Dave pounces upon him. Ulster attempts to use his pistol. In the struggle, the weapon is fired and Ulster is killed by his own bullet. Dave escapes. Deverill finds the body and is later accused of the crime. He is placed under arrest. Malva knows of the feud between her brother and Ulster. She returns to the underworld and finds Dave. Through strategy, she gets him to confess his crime. The man is arrested and Deverill freed. The minister has grown to love Malva and upon his release, makes her his wife.

JIMMY'S FINISH (Oct. 24).—Jimmy gets a job as photographer on a newspaper. Sent out to take some pictures, he stumbles upon what he believes to be a blackmailing case. Jimmy summons a policeman. The blackmailer turns out to be the secretary of the Truck Drivers' Union collecting monthly dues, and Jimmy gets a beating for his pains. He is next sent to take a photograph of the banquet given by the "Funnyfellows Klub." In taking the flashlight, Jimmy causes an explosion that wrecks the building. He is chased by the irate humorists and is saved by the police. He lands in jail and his employer is notified. The latter bails him out, and Jimmy gets another beating in addition to losing his job.

BETTY BUTTIN AND THE BAD MAN (Oct. 24).—After reading her brother's dime novel, Betty enters upon a career of crime by raiding the jam closet. The imprint of her hands on the doors of the house and barn are subsequently mistaken for those of Gory Pete, a bad man, who had broken jail. Gory Pete steals a pie from Norah, the cook. She summons Murphy, a policeman. He hears blood-curdling cries coming from the barn. In terror, he summons other officers. They break into the barn, where they find Betty brandishing a rusty horse-pistol at her doll. Meanwhile, in another part of the town, Gory Pete is captured by the smallest member of the force.

A RAILROADER'S WARNING (Oct. 25).—The paymaster of one of the mines is stricken with heart disease while on his way to pay his men. He staggers to the railway station and leaves the money with Dick, the telegraph operator for safe keeping. Two tramps witness the incident and plan to steal the money. A trackwalker reports a dangerous landslide. Dick sets the danger signal to warn the Overland Express. He decides to remain on duty until the track is cleared. To pass away the time he calls up his sweetheart, Margaret, the operator at the local exchange. The tramps overpower Dick after a desperate struggle. They bind and gag their victim, after which they rifle the safe. Learning of the landslide, they remove the danger signal, thinking the train wreck will hide their theft for a while longer. Dick knocks the phone off his desk with his feet. Margaret answers but can only hear a peculiar mumbling over the wire. Dick finally removes the gag and tells his sweetheart of what has taken place. Margaret dashes over to the station just in time to flag the express. The train crew go in pursuit of the thieves. The hoboes are found a mile down the track fighting over a division of the spoils. They are captured and lead away. Margaret and Dick receive the congratulation of the railroad officials because of their splendid work.

BIOGRAPH.

THE VAN NOSTRAND TIARA (Oct. 20).—When Mrs. Van Nostrand returned from Europe her new tiara was much advertised. A new lady's maid arrived, highly recommended, but following events proved that she was but the accomplice of Raffles. His crafty substitution of the diamonds on the famous tiara was discovered by the society detective, who captured the offenders in spite of their clever ruse.

A FALLEN HERO (Oct. 23).—Arnold and Wiggins were rival candidates for judge. "I'll put one over on Wiggins," declared Arnold, and he proceeded to hire the town band and march to the grand-stand where Wiggins held forth. "Bing," went the band, but Sammy Getup got one over on Arnold in a sudden and unexpected manner.

THE WINNING PUNCH (Oct. 23).—They were hard shells all right when it came to paying off the church debt, but Bud and Gertie found a way out of the difficulty in a church festival. They were tightwads to the core, but the punch got them.

THE MADONNA OF THE STORM (Oct. 25).—The bored clubman sought the excitement of the street. The husband, believing himself neglected for his child, left his home. There in the back saloon seeking shelter from the storm, the two met the demi-monde. The clubman displayed his enticing work of art, when to their surprise a picture of the Madonna and child confronted their view. The storm over, they went forth into the sunshine of the world.

ESSANAY.

THE WAY PERILOUS (Oct. 21).—Frank Davenport loses heavily at cards and in order to pay his gambling debts raises his father's check from $200 to $2,200. Feeling that he has disgraced himself and his family, he immediately leaves for the West there to begin life anew. Virginia, the ward of Col. Davenport, learns, through an official of the bank of the fraud practised by Frank, and out of love for him and in order to keep the knowledge of his offense from the parents, she turns her small inheritance to the bank. Some time later, Frank learns that his father is dying, and returning home to ask his forgiveness he finds that his parents never knew of his dishonesty and owing to Virginia, he is still their pride and joy.

DAY BY DAY (Oct. 22).—Vivian breaks her engagement to Frank when she hears he has lost all his money. Frank is forced to look for a job and has a mighty hard time of it. He meets his iceman, Bill, who tells him he can get a job with him. At a picnic Frank meets Bill's sister, Betty, with whom he falls in love, and eventually marries, when by a turn of the market his wealth is restored to him. When Vivian and her mother learn of Frank's good fortune they call on him, but great is their consternation and disappointment when Frank introduces them to his bride.

THE KID SHERIFF (Oct. 23).—Reno Bill, a desperado, discovers the sheriff and the express agent in the act of holding up the stage. The next day Reno Bill is captured by Fred Church and his young assistant, when they find him annoying a pretty young girl. They take him to jail and when the bandit sees the sheriff and agent he contemptuously tells Church of their treachery. Fred locks the three in jail together and places his assistant on guard, while he goes out to visit with the girl.

BRONCHO BILLY'S ELOPEMENT (Oct. 25).—Robert Johnson tries to influence his daughter, Mary, to marry Dave Morgan, much against her wishes. Broncho Billy outwits the determined father, elopes with the charming Mary and makes her his wife.

THE LOVE LUTE OF ROMANY (Oct. 24).—Frank Rogers and his sweetheart, Constance, visit a gypsy camp which has just settled in the vicinity of their homes, and Constance persuades Frank to let one of the gypsy girls tell his fortune. The Gypsy tells Frank, to the embarrassment of both the young people, that he will some day marry into Romany blood. They leave the camp in disgust, but Constance, in spite of herself, is disturbed by the prophecy. Raoul, the poet of the gypsy tribe, is looked upon as a good-for-nothing by the chief. Sybil and the poet are in love with one another, and when Castrous discovers that Raoul aspires to the hand of his daughter, in a rage attacks the young man. During the struggle, Raoul falls over the cliff. Sybil has seen her sweetheart fall, and believing him dead, is grief stricken. The father banishes her from the tribe and orders his band to decamp. Sybil wanders through the woods most of the night, and finally heart sick and weary, she finds refuge in an empty house on the outskirts of the woods. In the morning she is discovered by Frank, who takes her home to his mother. She is nourished and cared for by the kindhearted mother and son. When Sybil is better and ready to leave, she is offered a home with Mrs. Rogers. Frank's sweetheart is very unhappy when she learns that the gypsy girl is a member of her lover's household. Frank calls on Constance, but is ordered away by her father, and told not to come back until he has gotten rid of Sybil. The next day, Constance's father, while out on the road, falls unconscious from a sunstroke. He is found by Sybil, who, with the assistance of a stranger, takes the old man to his home, sends for help, and in the meantime, does all she can to revive him. When he regains consciousness, he learns that he owes his life to the gypsy. Sybil understands that she is the cause of unhappiness between Frank and Constance, and, as the open road has for some time been calling her, she determines to leave her benefactors, leaving a note for Frank, saying: "Your palm lied to me, you will marry Constance." The lovers find the note, which reunites them. Sybil has not wandered far before she hears the familiar notes of a lute, and following the sound of the music, she comes upon her poet sweetheart, whom she has believed to be dead. He explains to her how the fall had merely injured him for a time, as hand in hand they wander off through their beloved woods.

THE BIG SISTER (Oct. 20).—Agnes and Adele are sisters, Agnes being a girl of 23, inclined to walk the rugged and narrow path, but Adele being in the teens, has a tendency of traveling the broad and flowery one. Agnes loves, with a pure and innocent love, Sidney, a young man of good appearance, but not an over-abundance of good within him. One night in the club Sidney has a quarrel over cards with McWeeny, a human vulture, who threatens to get even for an insult. Later, when Agnes is out one day with Sidney, he meets Dick, a good friend, on the street. Sidney introduces Agnes to him and after some little talk they pass on. One day Adele comes home with a beautiful silk dress and a new hat and Agnes, being surprised, asks where she got them, realizing that her income would not warrant purchasing such expensive clothes, but Adele refuses to tell. The next night Adele dresses in the new clothes and goes. Agnes' suspicion is aroused, and she follows and sees Adele meet McWeeny and taken away in a taxi. Agnes being desperate, takes another taxi and follows, and sees Adele driven up to a large apartment building and taken within by McWeeny. She alights, and after some hesitancy, she runs up the steps and enters. This is all seen by Dick, who telephones to Sidney at the club, telling him that his girl has gone into McWeeny's apartments. Sidney leaves the club at once. McWeeny, having taken all methods of precautions to see that they are not disturbed, anticipates a great time with Adele, and they are about to drink their wine when a commotion in the reception room disturbs them. Adele hears her sister arguing with the butler for admittance, and begs McWeeny to hide her, who quickly tells her to take her hat and coat and go home by a back way. Agnes finally brushes the butler aside and comes in the room expecting to see Adele. McWeeny pleads innocence, but the presence of two wine glasses half empty convince Agnes that her sister is about and she says she will wait there until he gives Adele up, taking off her coat and hat. Agnes finally pleads with McWeeny, and is in a pleading position before McWeeny when Sidney dashes into the room and is horrified. McWeeny grasping the situation, fulfills his threat by saying Agnes has been forcing her attentions on him to take her home. He does so and the circumstances having been so convincing, he refuses to believe her. Agnes tells him that she was after her sister, who McWeeny has concealed, but when they get home Adele is in bed and Sidney leaves for good. Agnes' hears is now broken and broods over it so much, she enters a convent. Later Sidney learns the truth and goes to take Agnes from the convent, but goes away empty as her soul has now sought refuge in God and she has offered up her hopes on the altar of sacrifice, an innocent martyr, leaving nothing but white ashes, the aroma of which constitutes the atmosphere breathed by those having entered the joys of their Lord.

THE ANARCHIST (Oct. 23).—An anarchist (King Baggot) has a sweetheart (Leah Baird) who is sought after by another man. The latter meets the girl in a park, where, under the watching eyes of the anarchist, he makes violent love to her. Though she repulses him, the anarchist suspects her loyalty to him and casts her aside. The other man, in revenge, notifies the police of the whereabouts of the girl's lover and his companions. On the road home, after this happening, the unhappy lover, King, meets a little girl, buys her a toy horn and takes her to her doorway; she lives in an apartment directly above, where he has his studio. The police come and are about to break in the door. The anarchist, the girl and his companions decide to die rather than give up. Their leader is about to cast the bomb that would send them into eternity when he hears the horn blown by the little girl. He realizes that another life must be sacrificed if he throws the bomb. All surrender; and the anarchist takes the hand of the girl, assured of her loyalty.

CRYSTAL.

WILLIE'S GREAT SCHEME (Oct. 21).—Pearl has been forbidden to speak by her aunt, to young men. Unknown to the aunt, Pearl has met and fallen in love with Charlie. Willie De Vere visits the old aunt, Samantha, with a letter of introduction, and he is immediately spotted and labelled as a vicim to adorn her own hearth-stone. Willie meets Pearl and falls in love with her. He also meets Charlie, and in order to escape the advances of the old aunt, hires Charlie to make love to her. Charlie, with the prospects of gaining access to the house, takes the job and later informs Pearl of what he has done. Together they hatch a scheme. A letter is written by Pearl to Willie telling him that she can no longer keep the secret of his love for her aunt a secret. This letter, falling into the hands of the aunt, as it was intended, causes her to accept Charlie as Pearl's fiancé. Willie, when he arrives to pay respects to Pearl is showered with caresses from the aunt, but in the end she is left to herself and Charlie and Pearl are married.

THE TURKISH RUG (Oct. 21.—At Mrs. Belmont's request her husband gives her money with which to buy a rug. She buys a beautiful Turkish rug, which is delivered to the house that afternoon. A tramp visits the house and when refused food by her, steals it. He escapes with it though Mrs. Belmont gives chase. She informs a policeman of the affair. Mr. Belmont, returning late in the afternoon from the office, is met by the tramp, who wishes to sell the rug. Remembering his wife's desire for one, he purchases. He is later observed walking along with it by the policeman, and is arrested. Against his protests Belmont is started to the station house. On the way the tramp is met and Belmont asserts loudly that he is the one who sold the rug to him. The policeman arrests them both, takes them to the station house and locks them in a cell. Mrs. Belmont finally arrives, identifies her husband and he is released. The tramp goes to jail to await trial. On the road home husband promises wife never again to butt in on household affairs.

ROBERT'S LESSON (Oct. 26).—Alice Wilson loves and is loved by Robert Grant. He proposes marriage to her and she accepts him on probation, the probation being on account of his unruly temper and wild jealousy. If Alice tells him he can control his temper she will marry him. Ned Morris, a friend of Alice's brother, is introduced to her and is attentive to her. Bob sees this and his jealousy is aroused. The next day he is walking in the woods and he meets Ned. They have words and Bob throws him over a cliff. He believes him dead. However, Ned falls into a tree and is saved. Some men passing see him and lowering a rope lift him to safety. Bob, believing himself a murderer, exiles himself. He grows a beard and hikes West. There he lives a secluded life, living in fear that he will be discovered and arrested as a murderer. He suffers terribly and is slowly but surely cured of his jealousy and fiery temper. Meanwhile Ned recovers from his injury and again courts Alice. She refuses him, her thoughts being of her missing Bob. Ned, who is a traveling salesman, is sent on the road. He visits the town at which Bob is stopping. The boys at the hotel, out for a lark, shave the heads and faces of all in the place. Bob is one of the victims, they shaving off his beard. Ned enters the place and seeing Bob, offers him his hand. Bob, believing it a ghost, screams and faints. They carry him up to his room and Ned volunteers to stay with him until he regains consciousness. When Bob comes to he sees Ned, who assures him that Bob did not kill him. Bob assures Ned that he is sorry for the way he acted and that he will never lose control of himself again, having learned a lesson. Later, Bob returns home, and finding Alice waiting for him he renews his promises and his probation is lifted.

BISON.

THE SHE WOLF (3 parts—Oct. 21).—Grace, a She Wolf, a wrecker of men's hearts and reputations, tires of the bright lights and marries a miner. She wearies of the monotony and when her husband, Ford, is injured by a premature explosion and blinded she bears the burden with ill concealed impatience.

An immigrant train passes on the way to some diggings. One of the immigrants, Molter, sees Grace and she uses her wiles and he is quickly fascinated. She and he flirt while Ford, wanting a light uses the lamp and burning his fingers, leaves the globe off and sets the lamp near the curtain. He wanders out in search of Grace and the cabin takes fire. Ford overhears Grace and Molter and getting away he stumbles over an embankment and loses consciousness. The immigrants discover the burning cabin and Grace, thinking her husband dead joyfully takes the occasion to go with Molter. In the meantime Ford is found wandering about in a futile manner. His rescuer a miner named Kellar, takes the almost demented man along with him on his way to the newly heralded mining camp. The gambler and Grace join the gold rush to the new diggings.

After arriving Kellar takes Ford to a doctor, who works over his eyes. Kellar meets Grace and she is fascinated with him for a while, sets to work to ruin him also. He is finally persuaded to play cards with her and detects the gambler giving her signals. Kellar runs the latter off by pulling his gun and pointing it at him and Grace swears to get even with him. Kellar has words with a miner and they fight and are separated. Ford eventually recovers the sight of one eye and swears to revenge himself upon the She Wolf who deserted him.

THE COWBOY MAGNATE (Oct. 25).—Bainbridge, the agent of the S. V. Railroad, comes to the Clifford Ranch to negotiate for the right of way. Clifford agrees to go East to see the railroad officials. Arriving at the managing director's office, they meet Mr. Graham, and although Clifford refuses the offer made, he accepts an invitation to a ball from Phyllis, Graham's niece. He becomes very much interested in the girl, and they are finally married and go to the ranch to live. Time rolls on and a little son is born. Three years pass, and that part of the country is devastated by a ruinous drought. Unaccustomed to poverty, which overtakes them, Phyllis becomes disgusted with her surroundings, and yielding to the importunities of her mother, who sends her a check, the young wife returns to the East. Clifford, however, will not let her take their three-year-old boy. Phyllis does not stay long at home, for the railroad agent makes advances which fill her with disgust, and she sees a vision of her baby crying for her. She breaks away and hurries home once more—this time to her Western home. She makes her peace with the willing Clifford as a telegram arrives, renewing the railroad company's offer. Likewise there is a sudden bursting of the heavens, and the drought is broken by copious and prosperity-bringing rains.

This is the motion picture for which the California State Motion Picture Exhibitors recently posed at Universal City.

NESTOR.

UNDER WESTERN SKIES Oct. 22.—Bob is accepted as Bess' fiance and all runs happily until the arrival of a stranger, who gradually fascinates the simple girl of the ranch. Despite the protest of her family Bess listens to the interloper and it is not long before Bob comes to realize that he has been superseded in the girl's affections. Shortly after he received a note from her confessing her change of heart. It is not long after the marriage that the true nature of the stranger asserts itself; he takes to gambling and ill treating Bess. Bob looks on, unable to help, though his heart grows heavy. In the heart of a quarrel one afternoon there is an exchange of shots and the stranger flees, leaving a man stretched on the floor. Bob, who has been made sheriff, learns of the affair and seeing his duty starts in pursuit. There is a wild chase, the stranger is ambushed, there are several shots and he, in turn, is stretched on the ground, dead. The days pass on, allowing the girl to appreciate how unwise she had been in her first choice. Bob calls with his usual bunch of flowers, and her acceptance of them proves a readjustment of conditions and ideas.

HAWKEYE'S GREAT CAPTURE (Oct. 24).—Eddie, a clerk in a country hardware store, becomes very much peeved when the proprietor calls him down for spooning with his sweetheart during business hours, and has the temerity to answer back. The proprietor promptly fires Eddie. He goes to the city and applies for the position. The great Hawkeye hires Eddie, after the necessary fee is paid, and he is sworn in and sent out to "detect." He gets an early scent when he sees a woman pass carrying a parcel, dripping blood. Eddie follows the woman to her home. The woman's husband, who happens to be a REAL policeman, promptly pinches Eddie and marches him off to Hawkeye's office. There Eddie learns that the drops of blood came from a harmless dead fowl and the mistake almost costs him his position. Once more Eddie, the sleuth, goes forth and comes upon some mysterious acting Dagoes giving each other the "high sign" and entering a basement dive. Eddie crawls in through a window, looks through the keyhole and sees the Dagoes in earnest and secret meeting. Aha, a clue! The Black Hand, by Heck!

Eddie rushes back to the office, breathlessly tells his story, and the great Hawkeye, followed by his trusties, majestically leads them to the dive. They break in upon the meeting, arrest the surprised Dagoes and march them off to the office. Upon being confronted with their supposed crime, the astonished leader of the gang says: "We maka no plot. We Italiana Union. We raise the price of the banan." The terrified Eddie is stripped of his star and allowed to go "back to the woods" after paying another heavy fine.

WHAT THE WILD WAVES DID (Oct. 24).—Lee is in love with Marie but, being a soda fountain clerk, he cannot resist the temptation to flirt with the many pretty girls who partake of "sundaes" and the like at his counter. Marie catches him flirting with one of the pretty damsels, and in high dungeon writes him a note to the effect that she is through with him and prefers to spend her week's holiday at the beach alone with Ramona. The girls make preparations to leave. Ramona buys a very stunning bathing costume for $5.00. Marie, not to be outdone, buys one that "looks just like Ramona's," but only cost $1.48. Lee, hoping to conciliate Marie, and at the same time make her envious, sees (what he thinks is a bargain) a very nifty white flannel outfit and buys it, and hies himself to the beach. But at the beach Marie scorns to look at him, much less to talk to him, and when she passes, with a merry group of boys and girls bound for the surf, in all the glory of her bargain counter bathing suit, Lee meekly follows to sit and look on. When she has had her full of the surf, Marie emerges from the water, only to dash madly back again—for, alas and alack! her costume has somewhat diminished. This proves Lee's opportunity and, unmindful of "ice cream" suit, he dashes madly through the breakers and rescues the shivering Marie. His suit of white flannels also undergo a change. But blissful in their renewed happiness, the two lovers saunter off to the hotel oblivious of the mirth their changed appearance evokes.

POWERS.

THE KID (Oct. 22).—Little Kathie keeps the household in continual turmoil, she is a tomboy and insists in stirring up trouble. Of a morning she comes late to breakfast and in her nightie. Gertrude and Antrim, children, are the only ones at the table and a fruit fight is soon commenced.

Despite father's appeal, mother goes to investigate. Antrim and Gertrude place the blame on Kathie and she is spanked. None of the other children care to have Kathie around. Because Antrim drives her away from where he is playing marbles with his chum, she steals some of them; she interferes with Edna's love affair with the minister and again is spanked. When father returns that evening he listens to the recital of all the bad things Kathie has done. But father understands, he goes to the child and soon she is nestling in a pair of loving arms.

A MAN IN THE WORLD OF MEN (Oct. 24).—Edwin and David are twins. Edwin is seriously afflicted, but is not aware of it. The father and David arrange to get Edwin, who is an artist, to the mountains to prolong his life. David counsels, telling Edwin of his condition, but the father begs that this be not done.

Edwin and David arrive in the mountains and Edwin gets engrossed in his painting. He gets Alice, the daughter of their landlady, to pose for him and they fall in love. One day as Edwin is painting, a sportsman comes along with his wife. She offends him and he is brutal with her and is interrupted by the artist, who teaches the bully a lesson. The sportsman, in a fit of rage, deserts his wife. Edwin proposes to Alice and is accepted. He writes and tells his father of his engagement, and the father is distracted. He persuades the family doctor to write to the artist and tell him his condition. This he does and Edwin reads, with a heart turning to ice, that he has about a year to live. He cannot tell Alice. Time goes on and Fdwin sinks rapidly under the strain of the deception he is practising for the girl's sake. She believing him fickle and cowardly, gets interested in David, and one day the unselfish Edwin sees them kiss and knows that he is forgotten. He is overcome and falls and dies.

REX.

THE THUMB PRINT (2 parts—Oct. 23).—West, the foreman of the construction camp in which hydraulic pumps are in use, is discharged for drunkenness and young Clayton is installed in his place. The superintendent especially informs Clayton that the water at the pumping station must be turned off every night.

Dolores, the pretty waitress in the cook shack, is annoyed at the attentions of the Mexican cook, Pedro; and Clayton, admiring the girl and seeing she is distressed, promises to help her if necessary. West and Pedro put their heads together and precipitate a fight between West and Clayton. Pedro watches with fiendish glee and Dolores also sees the fight. Running to the wheel which turns the water on or off, she manages to stop the flow just as Clayton falls. At the private dining-room in the cook shack, Dolores places a note under Clayton's plate, telling him she is going home and asking him to meet her the following day at the old Mission. Pedro sees this and alters the note to read 'tonight." Clayton finds the note and is pleased. He prepares some paraffine and dips the wheel, which controls the water in the giant pumps, in it and also dips a coffee cup in the paraffine. This cup he takes into the kitchen and asks Pedro to re-fill it with coffee. He then throws out the fluid and takes the cup with him. That evening Pedro turns on the water again and Clayton is watching. Clayton takes the wheel home and compares it with the thumb print on the coffee cup, and knows that Pedro is the culprit. The superintendent is informed and congratulates Clayton and the latter goes to meet Dolores at the old Mission. West and Pedro, unknown to each other, go there too to get Clayton. They each mistake the other for Clayton and fight a revolver duel, in which Pedro is mortally wounded. Clayton finds West looking at the body of Pedro and there is a fight between them, in which they gradually struggle away from the man's body. Dolores is out with her father and is attracted by the shots. She sees that West is likely to shoot Clayton, and coming across the body of Pedro with the gun beside it, she picks up the weapon and shoots West. This leads to a complete understanding between the young people and they prepare to forget their troubles.

FRONTIER.

MISS FAIRWEATHER OUT WEST (Oct. 23).—Miss Fairweather is the principal of a school for girls. Her uncle, John Martin, the owner of the Centipede Ranch, has been bitten by a "bob" cat. The wound proved fatal and he journeyed to the happy hunting ground. Bud Wilson, the foreman, deemed it his duty to notify Miss Fairweather of her uncle's death and that she was the owner and heir. Miss Fairweather decides to visit the ranch and writes the foreman to that effect. She takes this opportunity to criticise him severely for the ungrammatical manner in which his letter to her explaining the "robert" cat was depicted. Upon receipt of this letter Bud has a fit. Later Miss Fairweather arrives at the ranch. The boys are all lined up in their best Sunday go-meeting clothes, expecting to witness the vision of beauty. But when she raises her veil to inspect them, and they get a glimpse of her dried up and shriveled countenance, they decide not to be bossed by her and plan to dispose of her in some way. It is then that the "robert" cat letter is brought forth, and they conceive the idea of fixing up a "robert" cat and scaring her away. The "robert" cat gets under Miss Fairweather's window and the noises that come from under the skin would beat a German band to a frazzle. The German cook conceives the idea of securing Miss Fairweather's appreciation by assuming the character of a hero, and protecting her from the "robert" cat. This he does to her entire satisfaction and after disposing of the "robert" cat the old maid falls in his arms, acclaiming him her hero. He shows Miss Fairweather the telegram and as apparently a baron is just about what she wants she immediately accepts. The baron secures her forgiveness, for the two who played the "robert" cat and the baron tells them that under his reign there will be peace and happiness with the Centipedes at Centipede Ranch.

JIM'S ATONEMENT (Oct. 25).—Tom Gray, cattleman, and Jim Stone, despised sheepman, quarrel over trespass of the sheepman's stock. They threaten one another. Later, Gray out hunting aims at some foxes and hits near Jim, whom he does not see. Believing himself to be attacked, Jim returns the fire and Gray is mortally wounded. He lives just long enough to assure the cowboys who are attracted by the shots that the affair was an accidental one, and to beg Jim to look after his little girl, which Jim solemnly swears to do. Jim sends Corrine east to school. Ten years later, tired of school life, she notifies her guardian that she is coming home, and Jim falls instantly in love with her. The arrival of George Nevins, an Eastern acquaintance of Corrine, and his apparently successful courtship of the girl cause Jim poignant agony. Bored by lack of excitement, Nevins makes secret love to Mariata, daughter of Jim's half-breed herder, Miguel. Miguel drinks and neglects his work, so that Jim is obliged to discharge him. He swears vengeance. Later Miguel chances on a meeting between Mariata and Nevins. When they part he comes out and asks Nevins if he is going to marry the girl. Nevins laughs in his face and makes an insulting remark, at which Miguel draws his knife. In the struggle Miguel is killed. Nevins, found near his dead body; is arrested. Jim, believing that Corrine's happiness is bound up in Nevins, goes to the sheriff and says that Nevins is innocent, and that he, Jim Stone, killed Miguel. Jim is locked up, and Nevins goes to Corrine who, on learning what has happened, suddenly realizes that her guardian, and not Nevins has her love. She dismisses Nevins, who makes all haste to get away, but is met by Mariata, who begs him to take her with him. He scorns her, whereupon Mariata laying hold of his bridle, threatens to tell the truth about her father's death. He shakes off her hold: she falls and he hurries away. Mariata is found half dazed by Corrine, to whom she tells her story. The two hasten to the sheriff and Mariata tells the truth, which Jim looking at Corrine cannot deny. The sheriff goes out to Nevins and Mariata creeps away, leaving Jim and Corrine alone. Corrine asks Jim why he lied, and he tells her he did it in order that she might be happy. With her arms about his neck she manages to convince him that happiness for her means Jim Stone and no other.

JOKER.

THE CHEESE SPECIAL (Oct. 25).—May, the daughter of the cheese manufacturer, Schmaltz, is visited by the rich banker, who asks her to marry him. She says most emphatically NO; her father whereupon kicks him out. The rich banker cries "revenge." May meets Dan, the engineer, and the meeting is witnessed by the outraged banker, who persuades the haughty railroad president to fire Dan. May sticks to her hero, however, and the banker must needs think of something else. Dan gets a job in the cheese factory. The banker notes this—"curses'" The banker bribes Snorty to call a strike of the cheese employees, and at the appointed time no one can be found to run the Cheese Special to deliver the cheeses; but yes! brave Dan volunteers and mans the engine, and the infuriated banker and his vile associates determine to wreck it. They plot, and are overheard by the faithful May, who goes to stop the special and warn Dan; but alas! she is seen and the cowards tie the brave girl to the tracks. The fiendish crew watch the oncoming train—she will be crushed but no! Dan sees a woman on the tracks and in a thrice jumps from the cab and stops the engine with one hand—a heroic deed! The villains attack Dan and he is knocked down, and the girl secured and taken off on a hand-car by the banker. He carries her from the hand-car to the boat, loses his balance and they fall in the water, where May is rescued by the pursuing Dan and the rascally banker and his associates are taken by the police, who arrive in the nick of time.

FOR OLD LOVE'S SAKE (Oct. 24).—Malcom loves Ellen and hopes to marry her. She has romantic notions, however, and marries Walter, a stranger in the village. She is disowned by her father, who dies shortly after. Years elapse and Ellen dies, leaving the boy, Jerry. Jerry is forced by his dissolute father to beg on the streets. Some time later he is found doing this by Malcom, who has come to the city. Jerry takes the boy to a cafe and is about to feed him, when, observing his father through the window, the boy makes a hurried exit. Walter and his companions, believing Malcom has money, plan to rob him, and, with this purpose in mind, lure him into a low saloon. Jerry, always in the background, observes the movements of his father and companions and after Malcom has been drugged, manages to get him out of the place and into Malcom's wagon. The horses, once in the country, guide the way home. When the drugged man awakens he finds himself in front of his own home. Jerry is taken in. On the mantel shelf he sees a picture of his dead mother. While Malcom is out, Jerry falls asleep with the picture hugged to his breast. Malcom finds him, and after a few questions discovers that the boy is the son of his old sweetheart, and that he has been rescued from the clutches of the scoundrel who married her.

HIS DOUBLE SURPRISE (Oct. 20).—Charlie, married, has a flirtation with Tessie Applesauce. A letter which he receives from her falls into the hands of his wife. Charlie explains that the letter was not meant for him, but for another Charlie, who is the image of him in appearance. Wifey is dubious about believing him, and it is not long before her suspicions are again aroused. She decides to test him. She pretends one evening, when her husband returns, that his double has been to the house, and as he resembled him so strong, she thought he was her own husband and allowed him to make love to her. Charlie is properly fooled, and seizing his pistol, goes hunting for his double. In his excitement he drops a handkerchief, which bears the name of Tessie. Wifey is aroused and determines to teach him a drastic lesson. Barring all doors and windows to the house she dons her nightdress, and when her husband returns after a fruitless search, he is told to go away and not disturb her husband, who is asleep. There is a pistol shot from the window and the enraged Charlie flees. When he is allowed to return he sticks close to home, his lesson thoroughly learned.

ECLAIR.

BIG-HEARTED JIM (Oct. 22).—Oh, dear! What can the matter be? Aline Myers and her husband rushed excitedly into the living-room and separated a melee consisting of six little girls and boys and as many maltese kittens. Francis Myers gently cautioned the youngsters to be kindly to animals. The youngsters were his sister Helen's kindergarten class, who were on a week-end visit in honor of the kittens' arrival. Little Bo-peep, Aline's favorite, clamored for a good-night story, so the elders settled themselves, and Francis began the tragic tale of his life.

The children had fallen asleep. A bell rang, followed by the hurried entry of the butler with a visitor's card. Francis looked at it and smiled happily. A moment later Jack Mitchell came into the room. The reunion was very happy indeed. Jack looked intently at Helen's sweet face, opened Francis' worn purse, and tendered to him the locket framing Helen's picture.

"You may have it back, Francis; I'll not need it any longer."

HE LOVES TO BE AMUSED (Oct. 19).—Papa Newlywed and his lovely wife looked up at their child apprehensively. Yes. Their own precious Snookums was on the warpath again. They were seated on the shore watching somebody's bow-wow fetch the sticks thrown into the water. Snookums liked the bow-wow. Wow, but the bow-wow did not like him. Snookums pulled tails too hard! Snookums joyously threw papa Newlywed's hat into the nice, wet water. Bow-wow's mean owner would not let him fetch the hat, so poor papa had to go in and get it himself. Then Snookums threw it back again and papa got another ducking. Then papa 'pank 'ittle precious. My, but he did howl! Mamma Newlywed got terribly upset and they brought him a great, big beautiful doll. When his lungs gave out, Snookums peeped at the doll. It winked at him. Enough! Snookums was his father's son and took it to his heart.

OXYGEN (Oct. 19).—Eclair's scientists have recorded in this film very clearly the power of the common element, oxygen. We absorb this element with the air we breathe, the water we drink, and the food we eat. It is a life essential. Science now utilies it in a prolonging life artificially through forced respiration. It can be reduced to a pale blue, strongly magnetic liquid

The films show experimentation with the oxya-etlynic pipe, the storing of oxygen in tubes, and it shows oxygen cutting through a fourteen-inch thickness of steel bar as though it were so much cheese. Finally, a wand tipped with oxygen cuts the word "Eclair" as fast as you could write it, on a sheet of steel. Truly, this is worthy of being called an "education."

A HEALTHY NEIGHBORHOOD (Oct. 16).—A young doctor settles in a small but healthy town. No patients. He hires a "tough guy" to scatter banana peels throughout the neighborhood. This brings comedy and patients.

THEIR HUSBANDS (Oct. 13).—Three couples, husbands and wives, decide to spend the day at the beach. Husbands struck by the beauty of the swimming girls decide to come in closer contact with them. Sneaking away from the wives, they wrap life preservers around themselves, dig up an old anchor, wade out into the surf and anchor themselves there and wait to be rescued by the young lady swimmers.

The swimming girls make an attempt to rescue the three chaps and discover it is a ruse to make their acquaintance and leave them to the mercy of the waves, from which they are later glad to be rescued.

BRONCHO.

BLACK SHEEP (Oct. 22).—Jim Foster is driven from his father's home because of his quick temper and drinking habits. His coming to blows with the farmhands at the supper table was the last straw. Jim wanders to the Southwest, where he becomes a cowboy. He falls gracefully into their habits and each pay day sees him "blowing his roll." One of these big days a quarrel started among some of the boys and Jim in drawing his gun accidentally discharges it, killing a cowboy whom he had been unfriendly to. The sheriff knowing of this feeling cannot be convinced but what it was intentional, and Jim in escaping becomes an outlaw with a price on his head. About this time Jim's father is struck by lightning and killed. His mother writes him to come home. He receives this from the postboy, who is friendly to him. Jim decides to hold up the stage to get money to return with. While laying in ambush for the stage he sees a band of Indians hovering around with evidently the same intentions as himself. Jim jumps astride his horse and rides to town and brings the sheriff and posse back with him in time to rescue the stage. Jim's sweetheart from his home town was in the stage. She had come out to bring Jim home to mother, which she did after she induced the sheriff to drop the charge that was against him.

KAY-BEE.

A WOMAN'S WIT (Oct. 24).—Ned Fern, a ranch foreman, is intrusted with the weekly payroll, which he keeps over night in the safe in his home. In spite of his wife's pleading, he goes down to try and cancel the I. O. U's the gambler is holding over head. After several hours' play, his I. O. U's are increased until the total is $1,500. The gambler, a stranger in town, is a notorious murderer and thief with a reward on his head; tells Ned if he will go home, open the safe and let the gambler go in and rob it of the payroll money, he will cancel the I. O. U's. Ned in desperation falls and agrees. Ned's wife is awakened by hearing someone at the safe. She awakes her son and sends him for the sheriff, and securing a gun, aims and fires and is horrified to find she has wounded her husband. Husband then makes a clean breast of everything. In the meantime, everything in readiness as he thinks, the gambler enters the house and as he opens the safe, Ned's wife kills him with a shot. She then rifles his pockets and secures Ned's I. O. U. just as the sheriff arrives. She is complimented for bravery, promised the reward, and last but not least a very pretty scene is enacted when Ned renounces his gambling habits.

DOMINO.

HEART OF KATHLEEN (3 reels—Oct. 23).—Kathleen and Denis Conner, a bold Irish lad of Killadykee, Ireland, are sweethearts. Kathleen and Denis are on the beach during a storm, watching and waiting for signs of the good ship which is bringing Kathleen's father home. Terrible and heart-rending scenes aboard the vessel as she founders. (This scene was taken in a terrific storm. It was with difficulty that the company was rescued). Kathleen's father and a stranger were washed up on the beach. Father was dead and it was with difficulty that the stranger, Robert Strathcone, was resuscitated. While convalescing, Strathcone makes ardent love to Kathleen, who is attracted by his smooth talk and manner. Denis, noticing the state of affairs, remonstrates with Kathleen, who in anger gives him back his ring, declaring it is all off between them. A year passing still sees Strathcone at Killadykee, in spite of the letters pleading with him to come to England and forget the Irish lass from his father, Lord Strathcone. Robert finally tires of the girl, writes her that he is going home. Kathleen receiving the note telling of his duplicity and knowing she is ruined, is stunned by the blow and bewilderedly wanders away. Denis finds her on the beach dead and find-

HIDDEN TREASURE RANCH (Oct. 20).—For years old man Potters had been tolerated by the townsfolk, living with one and the other as had the accommodations, but all humoring the old man's petty hobby of a hidden treasure. The story spread to such an extent that the place became known as the "Hidden Treasure Ranch."

This news attracts a spiritualistic medium, with the appellation of Ferdinand Del Garno. The ranchmen, Zeke Wilson and Bud Chester, are in love with the nieces of David Dalton and progressing very nicely as love makers until the redoubtable medium makes his appearance. By chance he learns of the location of the treasure and invites his adversaries to the formal unearthing. At the same time old Potter regains his memory and he makes his appearance to claim the treasure after the medium has uncovered it.

For his trouble, however, he has won the lasting affections of Meena Weeks and the boys are left to their own regrets, which they take out upon each other in a rather emphatic manner.

THE STEP BROTHERS (Oct. 23).—Ned Kerr and his step-brother Joe, lived with their mother, Mrs. Kerr, and all seemed happy enough except for a little friction between the boys in the matter of loving Jane Samuels, the local express agent's daughter. To Joe it seemed that Jane cared more for Ned and his heart was sad. The two boys were rival candidates for the office of sheriff and after the election Joe is given three cheers and a tiger as the new sheriff. Ned's frame of mind is anything but pleasant. Joe desires to resign in favor of Ned, but this is not sanctioned by the manager. Ned gives way to his bitter disappointment, discards the love of Jane and leads a life of dissipation. In an intoxicated condition he is made the scapegoat for a hold up of the express agent and he would have had an awful time to prove himself innocent. So Joe furnished him with funds to make a new start in an unknown territory and then Joe gives himself up as the perpetrator of the crime. The express agent, however, vehemently denies this, as he is confident he can identify his assailants, one of whom is brought in at this moment. Jane is pleased with the conduct of Joe and when their eyes meet, each reads in the expression of the other the evidence of true love.

IN THE MOUNTAINS OF VIRGINIA (Oct. 25).—Handsome Dr. Morse goes to the mountains of Virginia for his vacation. He stops at the cabin of an old moonshiner, Tom Vernon.

Vernon's charming daughter, Ida, and the doctor not only become very warm friends in a very short time, but soon develop a very marked infatuation for each other. As there appears to be no valid reason for Vernon interposing objection, he readily consents. But Jeff Hardy, an old sweetheart of Ida's, becomes extremely jealous and plots to rid himself of his successful rival. He forges a communication purporting to be sent by the chief of revenue officers to Dr. Morse and plants this in the doctor's coat pocket. At the same time he leaves an anonymous communication for Vernon, accusing Dr. Morse of being a government officer. A search of the doctor's effects reveals the planted letter. Accordingly he is taken in charge by Vernon and Hardy and brought to trial before the moonshiner's court. His fate is sealed, but through a daring feat he escapes without serious injury. In wending his way through the woods he passes a cabin, at the door of which he finds the prostrate form of a woman. Despite the great danger to himself, he carries the woman into the cabin and ministers to her wants. While thus engaged, Hardy enters and it proves that the afflicted woman is Hardy's mother. The doctor sends him to the Vernon home for his medicine case and after an all night vigil and strenuous work on the part of the doctor Mrs. Hardy resuscitates and progresses nicely. For this kindly deed Jeff Hardy is very grateful to the doctor and his first act is to write a letter to Vernon confessing his plot which was prompted by his own love for Ida Vernon. Cleared of the suspicion against him, Vernon readily consents to the marriage of the doctor and Ida.

RELIANCE.

POOR OLD MOTHER (Oct. 13).—Mrs. Engle, a woman of about forty-five, motherly, kind, loves her home and her children, Harry and Rose, who would marry were it not for poor old mother, whom they think, needs them.

Her son, Harry, has written to Daisy, his sweetheart, deploring the fact that he can't ask her to marry him, "Because his mother knows nothing of the world and needs him. Mrs. Engle is sorely distressed at this discovery. Shortly afterward, she overhears a conversation between her daughter, Rose, and her sweetheart, Tom, in which Rose says: "I cannot marry you, Tom, because mother is old and unaccustomed to the ways of the world, so I must stay."

Mrs. Engle resolves to disillusion her children and show them that she is capable of taking care of herself. Mother writes a letter to Tom to the effect that he can marry Rose, on one condition only—that he will obey her in everything. When Tom receives the letter he is much mystified, but resolves to obey.

When he calls the following evening he is surprised to see—not the quiet, motherly little woman, but a stunningly dressed, charming and dashing woman of apparently about thirty years of age. He almost collapses when he recognizes her as Mrs. Engle, but she quickly makes him acquainted with her little plot, and he readily agrees, as he sees a lot of fun and happiness ahead of him.

Together they go to the dinner and dance. Her son Harry and the two girls are already there. They almost faint when they see Mrs. Engle sweeping into the room accompanied by Tom. Harry and the girls are almost wild. Mrs. Engle and Tom go into the ball room and dance constantly together, the turkey trot, bunny hug and other up-to-date dances. Later Tom and Mrs. Engle dash down the front steps and into a waiting automobile. They ride swiftly away, but Harry and the girls dash after them in another auto. Tom and Mrs. Engle ride to the railway station and just catch a departing train. Harry and the girls miss the train. They shout, "Great heavens! they are eloping." Tom and Mrs. Engle arrive in another town an go to a hotel. Tom has her shown to a room and then waits outside for the coming storm. He sees Harry and the girls dashing up the street. They have arrived on another train. Tom rushes into the hotel. Harry and the girls go to the office, look over register, and are shown to Mrs. Engle's rooms. They frantically slam the door—open and see—Mrs. Engle dressed as we first saw her, in slippers and spectacles, calmly reading a book, the same loving, motherly, woman they have always known. Tom enters unobserved. After their astonishment, Harry and the girls ask the meaning of it all. Mrs. Engle smiles and explains her hoax she played on them. She says, "Go ahead—get married and be happy children. I guess poor old mother can take care of herself."

THE FLIRT (Oct. 15).—Two business partners discover that the same summer girl has carried on a lively flirtation with both of them. In order to punish her for playing so carelessly with their affections, they supply their office clerk with money and have him make love to the girl while posing as a millionaire. The clerk and the girl actually fall in love with each other and his confession of his real financial condition is met by the confession on her part that she is only a shop girl. They decide to marry at once, and the surprised partners receive a telegram in answer to the last thousand dollars that they forwarded to the clerk, thanking them for supplying the money for a delightful honeymoon.

A KNIGHT ERRANT (Oct. 18).—Runa, Judge Grey's only child, has every wish gratified except her longing for playmates. At the big gates which shut her in, she watches the children at play outside. Jimmie Jerrold, a street urchin, loiters near, and Runa strikes acquaintance with him through the bars. Every evening, at dusk, Runa steals out to exchange confidences with her new friend. Her nurse discovers the meetings, takes the news to Runa's mother, and the friendship is prohibited. Jimmie lingers around in vain, for Runa comes no more. In Judge Grey's court Dutch Joe is found guilty of grave crimes. Sentence is to be passed in a week. Joe's pals, knowing that he will get the limit, decide to intimidate Judge Grey. Mrs. Grey gives a reception and at dusk the gates are left open to allow of the passage of vehicles. Runa seizes this, her first opportunity to see Jimmie again, but just as she reaches the gate, a strange man jumps out from behind the shrubbery and snatches her up. Runa screams, but Jimmie is the only person within hearing. Tooth and nail he attacks the two men, but he is knocked down. He sees them enter a taxi and catches on behind and is whirled with them cityward. He notes the wretched house in the slums where Runa is taken, and manages to climb the fire escape and locate her, lying on a bundle of rags, on the third floor. It is miles to the Judge's house, but Jimmie tramps it, arriving at midnight. The parents' panic at Runa's disappearance has been increased by the discovery of a notice which says. "You let Dutch Joe go scot free or your kid is gone forever." Jimmie is about to be turned down by the butler, when Runa's nurse recognizes him. Judge Grey and the Chief of Police, in conference, hear Jimmie's story and the party is soon flying cityward. Jimmie locates the house, the chief summons a squad and the men are taken while preparing to remove Runa. One of them, recognizing Jimmie as the kid who interfered, and to pay him for informing, gives him a cruel blow, before he is handcuffed and led away. Jimmie is carried back to the Judge's house and when he recovers, finds that he is no longer a street urchin, but the ward of a wealthy man, and greatest joy of all, has earned the priceless privilege of playing with Runa every day, unhindered.

MAJESTIC.

THE WEDDING WRITE-UP (Oct. 12).—Mary Logan, a budding literary aspirant, is bent on having a "career." Mary lives in a small country town, and Bruce Caldwell, a young man living nearby, loves her. She determines to make a name for herself in the world and when Bruce asks her to marry him and settle down in a home in the little village she laughs at him. Finally a magazine accepts one of her stories, and Mary goes to the city to start her "career." Bruce feels Mary's departure keenly but goes to the city determined to forget her. He succeeds in business, and his employer Howard Hinton, invites him to his home where Bruce meets Muriel, Hinton's beautiful daughter. Muriel is vain and selfish, but those defects are hidden beneath a pose of sweet simplicity. Bruce becomes fascinated with her charms, and begins to forget Mary. Mary, in the meantime, has risen in the newspaper field and is society editor for a prominent paper. In spite of her success she longs for the home and protection she might have had with Bruce. Bruce proposes to Muriel and is accepted. A date is set for the wedding and Mrs. Hinton sends an announcement of the event to the newspaper together with Muriel and Bruce's photographs. Bruce and Muriel are talking merrily when the maid ushers in a little shabby old lady, Bruce's mother, who has come to the city to surprise him, and not finding him at his office was directed to Muriel's home. Bruce greets her with a cry of welcome and takes her in his arms. Muriel draws back aghast, and in disgust, she had expected Bruce's mother to be a stylish one like her own. Her attitude enraged Bruce and the engagement is broken off, but Mrs. Hinton tells Bruce that an announcement of the engagement was sent to the "Clarion," the paper for which Mary was editor. Bruce hurries to the newspaper office to prevent the wedding announcement appearing in the paper, and there finds the society editor weeping over the article. He recognizes Mary, then realizes that his love for her has never died, slowly tears the 'Wedding Write-Up" and takes in his arms the girl who gladly gives up a career to be his wife.

THE VAN WARDEN RUBIES (Oct. 14).—While the Frederick Van Wardens are entertaining week-end guests at Pinehurst, their beautiful suburban home, the famous Van Warden rubies disappear in a mysterious manner. Hastings, an unprincipled adventurer, makes the acquaintance of the Van Wardens, works his way into the good graces of Van Warden, Senior; wins large sums from Van Warden, Junior; and sues for the hand of Marietta, the daughter. Van Warden gives his consent. The girl, however, has plans of her own, and becomes secretly engaged to Ted Rollins, clever young reporter and amateur detective. Phil Van Warden loses heavily at cards to Hastings, and appeals to the father for money; the father, incensed at his son's extravagance, refuses and cuts off his allowance; the boy, pressed for debt and desperate, is ordered from the house.

Hastings is invited to spend the week-end with the Van Wardens shortly after his arrival, a messenger from the jeweler's delivers the famous Van Warden rubies, which have been reset. Hastings, realizing he has little chance of winning Marrietta, determines to secure the rubies; there is an alarm; an accident some one is hurt and in the confusion the rubies disappear in a mysterious manner. Phil Van Warden who is hiding in the house at the time, having called hoping to get money from his sister, is caught under suspicious circumstances. The irate father accuses his son of the theft, and disowns him. Ted Rollins, although he lacks complete confidence in Phil, determines to try and clear the boy for his sister's sake. The girl's suspicions are directed toward Hastings; she confides in Ted, who places Hastings under surveillance and discovers a clue, a mysterious message which Hastings sends asking a sister of charity, to call for a donation. At the appointed time Ted and three plain clothes men are waiting the "Sister of Charity," who proves to be Cummings, a confederate of Hastings. The rubies are recovered; Phil is reinstated in his father's favor; and Ted does not go unrewarded for he wins one whose price is far above the rubies.

THANHOUSER.

A DEEP SEA LIAR (Oct. 12).—The girl just "doted" on romances. While at the seashore, she found much entertainment in watching the sturdy guards, who go out to sea in all sorts of weather to give aid to those on wrecked ships. Their daily drills were interesting, but one day she had a real thrill. Far out in the angry sea a man was seen swimming, and the life boat was launched and the swimmer rescued after an exciting battle with the waves. The man was revived with difficulty and while he was convalescing in the life savers' station, the girl called, and learned all about him, at least what he had to say. He told her that he was a millionaire, passionately fond of the sea, and owner of a large yacht on which he took frequent cruises. Because of his prominence he had influential enemies, and by an enormous bribe, they corrupted his captain. One dark and stormy night they mutinied, while the yacht was far out to sea, and the owner was thrown overboard. Being a powerful swimmer, he kept afloat for thirty hours, but was nearly exhausted when picked up. The girl was thoroughly impressed and it was a case of love at first sight. She told the matter of fact aunt of her romance, and the elder woman decided to investigate. They called on the "millionaire" and the aunt did not like his looks and bluntly told him so. The girl pleaded with her guardian not to be so cross, and while they were arguing, the wife of the captain of the life savers entered. The aunt questioned her about the "millionaire," and the captain's wife replied that the swimmer was not a millionaire at all. In fact, he was only a drunken deckhand on a coastwise steamer who had fallen overboard while drunk. Then she casually announced that the man's wife and children had arrived, which was the cue for an angry woman to enter, followed by a swarm of youngsters. Romance vanished at once and the girl departed thoroughly disillusioned, while the deckhand's wife led him off by the ear, scolding him for being a Twentieth Century Ananias.

THE PLOT AGAINST THE GOVERNOR (Oct. 14).—A dishonest political boss ruled a great state with profit to himself, until he made the mistake of nominating an honest, ambitious young man for governor. The candidate was elected, and the Boss got the surprise of his life when the executive announced that he intended to run the state himself, and did not need the help of the Boss in picking out his subordinates. Naturally he fell into disfavor with the political powers, but as the general public was satisfied, he decided that it did not matter. He failed, however, to realize that a crooked political organization stops at nothing, and the boss arranged a plot, that if successful would have ruined him beyond repair. A letter was sent to the Governor purporting to be from a man who would expose grafters who had robbed the state of millions. The writer explained that he was too much afraid to appear at the Capitol, so insisted that the Governor call upon him. The Boss figured that the Governor would fall into the trap, and enlisted the aid of an unscrupulous woman, who was ready to swear that the Governor had called to see her.

Fortunately for the honest young executive, the stenographer of the Boss overheard the plot, and it shocked her. Yielding to a sudden impulse she confided in an elderly woman, who lived in the same tenement, and with whose son she was falling deeply in love. This woman urged her to inform the governor, but the girl held back, fearing that she might be involved in the scandal herself, for she knew and feared the power of "The Organization." Then as a last resort, the old woman revealed the secret to her son. He had been railroaded to prison for a crime he never committed, and being too poor to hire lawyers, seemed destined to serve out a long sentence. Finally the mother appealed to the governor, and he painstakingly investigated the case, decided that an injustice had been done, and pardoned the young man. This decided the girl and the governor soon heard all the details of the plot. He decided to give the conspirators all the rope they wanted, and enlisted the aid of his cousin, who resembled him to a remarkable degree. Just when the Boss thought his plan had succeeded, he found that he had been tricked, and instead of ruining the Governor, was himself arrested on a charge of conspiracy and sent to prison for a long term.

A PEACEFUL VICTORY (Oct. 17).—A wealthy manufacturer was a harsh and unfeeling employer. He regarded his men as merely a part of the vast factory whose products were distributed throughout the world. The men's wages were small, and as the employer refused to grant an increase, a strike was called. The workingmen were no match for their stern employer. Their places were filled by others and day after day the strikers saw their families failing in health of insufficient food. The manufacturer's daughter, who has just passed sixteen, had always been shielded from the world, and regarded her father as the kindest and best of men. She had reason for her belief, for the finest traits of his character were displayed to her. A glimpse of the real world which she had never known was revealed to her when the gardener captured a ragged child whom he found picking flowers on the estate. The girl witnessed the scene and took the child into the house. There she learned the story of a starving family whose means of livelihood had been taken away by the strike. She fed the famished little girl, and took food to the home. The rich girl was welcomed, for the striker and his family realized the spirit in which her gifts were meant. "My father will surely take the men back," she assured the striker, but her optimism was not justified, for when she spoke to her father, he sternly refused to grant her request. "It is business, my dear," he replied, "and you don't understand it." Worry over the problem, which she was powerless to solve, brought on a serious illness. Her father, business forgotten, was constantly by her side. In a moment of consciousness she pleaded once more with her father, and he yielded. The workmen returned to the factory, puzzled by the strange action of their employer, who had granted their demands as they were hopelessly beaten. The manufacturer was amply repaid for his action, for his daughter passed through her illness, and in her love and the respect and admiration of his employees he found greater happiness than he had ever known.

APOLLO.

KETCHAM AND KILLEM (Oct. 12).—The editor and business manager of the "Modern Magazine," while riding in a street car, have a list of names before them, and one suggests to the other that he "kill these." They are overheard by a fellow passenger, an amateur detective, who does not know that the phraseology "kill 'em" means to strike their names from the list.

The passenger (Fred Mace), is the raw sleuth. When they leave the car he follows them and picks up the list that they have dropped. This enables him to notify each one that he was a "marked man." He saw the magazine men look at pistols in a store window, and after they had bought one he followed them to a place of seclusion where they practiced shooting at a target, which happened to be the end of a dry goods box, behind which the sleuth had concealed himself, doing a lot of good comedy work.

The "marked men," accompanied by a policeman, finally round up the editor and his companion, who explain the full significance of "kill 'em" and make clear that the editor had bought the pistol for his brother, in the West. The business manager then gave the delinquent subscribers bills, in full to date and the policeman made them pay, against their will. By this time, the amateur detective had become the center of interest, likewise of action, and before he emerged from the melee, he had been reduced to something that looked like an infringement on a jello pudding. He finally pulled himself together, getting away from the scene with speed.

Sargent's Photoplay Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

MR. EXHIBITOR DON'T MISS THIS

gently and has developed into an objectionable little girl whose every whim must be gratified. Playing one day with a ball near the mill, she kicks it along a lane, where it stops at the feet of a little boy. Being a boy, Matthew kicks the ball. This so enrages Juliet that nothing less than an abject apology from Matthew will appease her, and the mill foreman punishes the boy still further by ordering him to stay in the mill all day Sunday to "clear things up a bit." On Sunday Juliet's cousins come to play with her, and they choose the precincts of the mill as a playground. Inquisitive, Juliet goes into the elevator well and automatic action sets the machinery in motion. Juliet is in danger of being crushed to death. Her companions and the maid rush for assistance, but being Sunday, the only man at the mill does not understand the working of the elevators. Matthew, however, comes to the rescue. He has heard the men say that by opening the water sluices all the elevators could be stopped, so running to the sluice he opens it and the weighted elevator stops just as it is on the point of crushing little Juliet.

The knowledge that her rescuer is Matthew, the boy whom she had humiliated the previous day, teaches Juliet a much needed lesson, and she in turn apologizes to Matthew. The film ends with the boy on his way to become an engineer, and on the best of terms with Juliet.

SIMPLE SIMON'S GRIZZLY HUG (Oct. 16).—The fact that the Four Arts Club were organizing an international competition of modern dances was welcome news to Simple Simon. When he ascertained that the dances would include the Cake Walk, Serpentine Crawl, Piccadilly Flop, Tango, the Wriggly Wriggle, and the Bear Dance, he selected the latter. Simon resolved to seek a teacher in its native haunts. He wandered up the mountain side and chanced upon a strolling Bruin, which he decided to capture. Learning to dance in the ordinary way holds sufficient excitement for most people. Simon, however, found that the bear dance provided unsuspected thrills. He made rapid progress, so much so in fact he won the prize. Knowing Simple Simon well one would not have suspected him of ingratitude. One may be unfair in suggesting that such is the case, but the fact remains that although the bear had assisted him to win the prize, Bruin's claims were altogether overlooked and he did not even receive a "codding card," viz., highly recommended. The film is one long scream. Crowded with funny incidents, happily conceived and daringly carried through.

GREAT NORTHERN.

CAUGHT IN HIS OWN TRAP (Oct. 11).—Randal, the manager of the motion picture theater, is enamored of the young woman in the ticket booth, but Oda, the daughter of the proprietor, takes exception to their conduct and complains to her father, Mr. Corna. Randal and his sweetheart become enemies of the young woman and this enmity is extended to Linck, the operator of the motion picture machine, who is in love with Oda. The latter is the pianist of the theater and during an intermission, Linck pays her a visit and leaves his booth unprotected. Shortly before his departure the proprietor has intrusted him with a valuable feature reel subject and warns him to be careful of it.

During the absence of the operator, Randal enters the operating room and with a knife, slashes the film that had been intrusted to the care of the operator. Randal cuts himself accidentally and when the film is placed upon the screen the audience demands its money back on account of its mutilated condition. An investigation follows and both Linck and Randal are called to the manager's office. The cashier and Oda later appear and the climax arrives when Oda explains that it would have been impossible for Linck to have mutilated the film, because he was seated at her side during the intermission. When it is noticed that there is blood on the film and that Randal's hand is bandaged, manager Corna puts two and two together and dismisses both the manager and cashier.

A HUSBAND'S STRATEGY (Oct. 18).—The Countess Golten invites her friend, Mrs. James Perrin, the wife of a rich banker, to help at a charity bazaar. At one of the early meetings of the bazaar committee, Mrs. Holten is introduced to the son of her hostess, Count Holten, a dashing young officer, who proceeds to make himself agreeable. When the bazaar is opened, Aileen Perrin is a stall holder and in cavalier fashion, the Count Holten pays her homage at every step. She easily succumbs to the flatteries of her admirer and thinking that her husband is so thoroughly absorbed in business that he has no time for her, she permits the count to kiss her hand.

This simple little act is witnessed by the husband and he rages inwardly. After a riding trip has been arranged Perrin, the banker, is served with papers for divorce. Then it is that the couple come to a realization of the mistake that has been made. Aileen makes her home with her aunt and dismisses young Count Holten when he pays his next visit. The young woman will not plead for forgiveness, however, and at the end of a year Perrin and his wife find themselves face to face at a house party. Mrs. Perrin is acting as companion to Miss Clara Evans, a wealthy spinster, and he pretends to pay the latter assiduous attention. Later the two chief characters pay a visit to an ancient ruin and through the scheming of her husband, Aileen and her husband find themselves locked in the old castle, with no chance to escape until morning. A reconciliation is effected in these strange surroundings and when the sun rises, the past has been forgotten.

SOLAX.

FISHERMAN'S LUCK (Oct. 17).—Sam Timkins, his wife, his friends and their wives decide to go camping. At daybreak after camp is made, the men go fishing. Getting out of bait, Sam volunteers to go ashore and catch some frogs. His exciting chase after a frog on his hands and knees brings him to the camp of some young girls. The frog is forgotten, and Sam makes good with the girls. He returns to the boat and brings his friends, who pose as "college boys" on their vacation. Dinner is served and great joy prevails. Meantime the wives having prepared a fine dinner await the arrival of their hubbies with loads of fish. The husbands get back to camp and explain their lack of appetites to the disappointment of not catching anything. Three days elapse, and while the hubbies are away on a fishing expedition, the wives' suspicions are aroused by a passing country lad with a string of fish. The wives try a hand and land a fish on the first cast. They decide to show their hubbies the spot, and in the search discover them dancing the "bunny hug" with the girls. The efforts of the day were not wasted, however, as they resulted in a great "catch," as proven by the beaten up husbands being towed home by their victorious wives.

ISH GA BIBBLE (Oct. 17).—Mrs. Buxton calls at her husand's business office to get money for a shopping trip. He gives her all there is in his purse. Later in the day he has calls from various bill collectors, and finds himself practically a prisoner, as the collectors are all waiting for him outside. A tramp comes along and he effects a change of clothes with the tramp—retaining only his watch—and thus disguised, escapes the collectors. He goes to the bank to cash a check, but the cashier does not recognize him, and refuses payment. He tries to get lunch at a restaurant, but is turned out. He goes home, but the maid shuts the door in his face and the footman puts the hose on him. He buys a wienerwurst from a street pedler and eats it on a park bench. He looks at his watch, but is noticed by a tramp, who tries to pick his pocket of it. They fight and both are arrested. He sends for a friend, who pays his fine. He goes home and enters his wife's room by the window. She rings for the footman. Mr. Buxton throws the footman out and reveals himself to his wife, who throws her arms around his neck.

LUX.

MOLLIE'S UMBRELLA (Oct. 17).—Mollie has an umbrella to which she is greatly attached. Several other people become attached to this umbrella during the course of her morning's walk, but in a manner entirely different. The wicked March winds waft the umbrella skyward and Mollie follows her umbrella as best she can. On the housetops she encounters many obstacles which finally cause her to take the wrong turn and wander down the mouth of a chimney. Emerging from this wrong turn, she is as black as black can be. Subsequent adventures cause her to change color, but long before this you will be obliged to stop the film and give your audience a rest or they will die of laughter.

IN A GRANITE QUARRY (Oct. 17).—An interesting industrial film revealing the mode of obtaining granite blocks for our buildings. There is possibly no metal with which we are so familiar as this durable building material.

ITALA.

THE QUEEN'S JEWEL (Oct. 23).—The Queen's Jewel treats of a fanciful kingdom of the type that made "Graustark" a best seller. This film story has a prime minister (consummately acted by he who made the title role of "Tigris" famous) who tries to compromise the queen by preventing her from recovering the jewel miniature which she had given to the lover of other days. The "D'Artagnan" in this instance is the fiance of the queen's lady-in-waiting. A resourceful fellow he proves to be in his efforts to return to the queen with the retrieved jewel in time to frustrate the malevolent designs of the minister. He is equally at home in an aeroplane, automobile, motorcycle or railroad train and, of course, like all proper and successful heroes, he thwarts the plotters, though only after many mishaps. This feature introduces dashes of comedy and the low lights have a brightening effect upon the somberly serious.

FAMOUS PLAYERS.

AN HOUR BEFORE DAWN (three parts—Oct. 20).—Prof. Wallace, a scientific authority, strenuously objects to his son Richard's romance with Violet Dane, a chorus girl in "The Red Rose" Company. Prof. Wallace tells the girl that unless she abandons every relationship with his son, he will completely disinherit him. That night the servant overhears a heated altercation between father and son, and the next day the professor was found dead with a mysterious wound in his side. Kate Kirby, the girl detective, is engaged. All the arts of modern criminal detection and many unique methods are introduced, which prove futile until Miss Kirby finds a carbon sheet, the impression on which is a letter from the professor to Violet, asking her to call after the performance, as he wishes "to settle." Bloodstains are discovered leading to the observatory, where other disclosures prove the professor was shot. A notebook found in the professor's pocket indicates that he had been engaged in an experiment until an hour before dawn, which stamps the time of his death. The son is arrested on the strength of motive. Following the clue disclosed by the carbon, Miss Kirby secures a position in "The Red Rose" Company and becomes intimate with Violet in an effort to gain her confidence. The son is subjected to a gruelling third degree, and collapses under the ordeal. These facts are graphically told in the evening paper, which Miss Kirby reads in an intensely dramatic manner to Violet in the hope that she will admit her guilt. Later, Miss Kirby overhears her praying for the fate of Richard so earnestly as to force the conclusion that she is innocent. But Miss Kirby is absolutely mystified when she receives a telegram from police headquarters advising her that Violet has confessed to the murder. Miss Kirby suspecting Violet's motive, cross-examines the girl, who adheres to her confession. The boy is released, in Violet's presence. It is the first time that the two have met since the professor's death, and the pathos of the meeting, tragic in the extreme, is intensified when the boy hears the confession and recoils in horror, renouncing Violet, who, with stoic fortitude, abandons herself to her fate. Miss Kirby reexamines the effects of the deceased professor, and discovers a note referring to the perfection of a wonderful invention an hour before dawn. A gleam of new hope enters the mystery, she enlists the interests of her father—a paralyzed detective introduced in "Chelsea 7750"—and they discover that the professor was killed by a terrific explosive force (technically known as infra red ray, the discovery of which by Signor Ulivil, an Italian engineer, has so lately startled the scientific world). Miss Kirby at once apprises the police and the deadly machine demonstrates the manner of the professor's death. Whose hand operated the wondrous contrivance that caused automatic and instantaneous death, is, however, left to the imagination of the audience.

APEX.

THE BLACK SNAKE (Feature Subject—4 parts).—Zadija, a dancer, is known as "The Black Snake" because of the nature of her performances, and Blanche D'Estree, an equestrian—both famous in the Russian capital.

Ivan Romanoff, a scion of a good family, is known to both; Blanche in particular, however, to whom he has paid close attention which has aroused the jealousy of Zadija. Romanoff has concealed his real identity, and is known as Koroff. But Abdullah, Zadija's Arab servant, is a hidden witness of an interview which he has with a military officer of importance, and informs Zadija of the real identity of the so-called Koroff.

"The Black Snake" is greatly alarmed at the news, for she at once realizes that the man she has hoped to make her lover is the agent of the Government, and the possessor of plans of incalculable value to a secret society of which she is a member, and the recovery of which is her secret mission in the capital.

By means of a hole in the dressing-room wall Zadija is enabled to be an unseen witness of an affectionate meeting between Blanche and Romanoff. The sight inflames her anger, and she jumps at the opportunity which a letter from her cousin Olaf, a leading member of the secret society, offers, both to serve the latter and to satisfy her desire for personal vengeance.

She contrives to enter Blanche's dressing-room, in which Romanoff is waiting while the girl goes

ANNOUNCEMENT

We are now printing the word "Eastman" on the margin of all our Cine film. We want the exhibitor to know when he is and when he is not getting Eastman film. It will be to his advantage—and ours.

Of course it will take time for such identifiable films to reach the consumer—so don't expect results at once—but it's a step in the right direction—for your interests and ours.

through her performance in the ring, and to slip into a drawer the letter from Olaf. Pretending she has seen Blanche place the letter there, she produces it and hands it to Romanoff. He is stunned at the thought that Blanche is his secret enemy, and agrees to Zadija's suggestion that he shall leave the city with her for a safe place. They set out before Blanche has finished her performance, but "The Black Snake" is unaware that D'Olton, an attache of the Governor, has seen their departure.

Olaf, cousin of Zadija, has received "The Black Snake's" message that she is bringing Romanoff to the house—the headquarters of the society from which she is supposed to be rescuing him. Olaff greets them in the disguise of a butler. Meanwhile, on the strength of information left by Romanoff, orders are given for the arrest of Blanche for treason, and D'Olton and a number of soldiers go to the theater to seize her. She is just about to enter the ring, and succeeds in persuading the officer to allow her to go through her performance. This includes a leap from a plank near the roof of the building on to the back of a horse galloping below. Blanche jumps upwards instead, and, succeeding in catching hold of a window frame in the tower, breaks the glass and manages to get through to the roof. Her plucky dash for liberty is, however, ineffectual; the building is surrounded, and she is seized on the roof.

Blanche is committed to prison, but her demeanor before the Governor impresses D'Olton, who, remembering the departure of Romanoff and Zadija, determines to get on their track.

Romanoff, already grateful to Zadija for his supposed rescue from the grip of the secret society, and heartbroken at what he believes the treachery of Blanche, asks Zadija to be his wife. The proposal and "The Black Snake's" ready acceptance are overheard by Olaf, who himself loves his cousin, and he determines on the removal of his rival. In the meantime, D'Olton, the attache, sets out for the house which shelters "The Black Snake" and her victim. Before he reaches his destination he is attacked by a savage pack of wolves, which surround the sleigh and force him to cut the traces and make a dash for safety on the horse's back. Still he cannot outpace the enemy, and at last he is pulled to the ground, and only rescued from their fangs by the timely intervention of a number of peasants.

The nearest house is that of "The Black Snake," and thither D'Olton, half unconscious, is carried by the villagers. Zadija recognizes him and scents danger. To reassure her D'Olton, who has ascertained by means of a small mirror in his cap that she is listening behind the curtain at the door to his conversation with Romanoff, informs the latter that Blanche has died in prison.

When night comes, D'Olton, peering through the window sees Romanoff embracing "The Black Snake," and realizes how things stand. He enters, and Olaf, in the character of a butler, shows him to his room. D'Olton, taking Olaf by surprise, overpowers and gags him, and taking his clothes and wig, carefully disguises himself to resemble the pseudo butler.

D'Olton telegraphs the governor and the house is surrounded by troops. D'Olton meets the Governor and Blanche in the garden, and gives certain instructions to the latter. As "The Black Snake" is dressing she is horrified to observe in her mirror a reflection of the face of Blanche, whom she thinks dead. As Blanche moves forward from the curtains, the menacing figure in the mirror grows plainer, and at last, in a paroxysm of terror, Zadija breaks the mirror to fragments. At the same moment Blanche steps back behind the curtains. Zadija, thinking it has all been an illusion, but still alarmed, calls for Olaf. D'Olton enters in his disguise, and when Zadija goes to him in alarm to tell of the fright she has had, he claps handcuffs on her wrists.

A moment later Romanoff enters. When he sees Blanche, whom he thinks dead, he cannot control his surprise, and when D'Olton tells his story, and Romanoff learns that Blanche has been falsely accused, and that "The Black Snake" has been his real enemy, he can hardly find words to express his contrition. Blanche readily forgives him, and the lovers are re-united, free forever from the malevolence of "The Black Snake."

UNION FEATURES.

IN THE JAWS OF THE LAND SHARK (3 parts—Feature Release).—Tired of the social whirl and anxious to take her ease after a life of hard study and successful medical practice, Madame Remond, a noted woman physician, sought seclusion in the mansion of a vast estate, "Wildwood," which she purchased. Madame Remond, in acquiring "Wildwood" incurred the enmity of Mr. Hormois, the country notary, who had long coveted that estate as one of the choicest in that part of the country. She was really very happy in her new environment, and enjoyed supervising the improvements instituted by Paul Daubry, her good-looking and competent agricultural expert.

In the village, the peasants were discussing the newly arrived great lady. Francis, a peasant who had quarreled with an employee at "Wildwood," launched forth into a bitter tirade against the lady. His comrades thoughtlessly piled observation on observation, until to hear the company over their light wine, one might have thought Madame Remond a truly dangerous woman to the community. Then followed many annoying occurrences which mystified Mr. Daubry and Madame Remond. All manner of farm products were filched in the night, the barn took fire, standing wood was cut in quantities; finally, Francis himself was caught in the act of poaching. Madame Remond had interceded for some of the malefactors, but permitted Francis to be sentenced to prison as an example. He parted from his little daughter brokenly.

Renee, godchild to Madame, was asked to make her home at "Wildwood." This she consented to gladly, for she and Mr. Daubry had fallen in love. The old notary, Mr. Hormois, also fell in love with Renee, and went so far as to offer her his hand, heart and wealth. She refused him.

On being freed from prison, Francis made his way to Mr. Hormois, whom he knew had coveted "Wildwood," and offered his services in making things so uncomfortable for its owner that she would gladly sell it. Hormois suggested it seemed strange that all the sheep in the countryside except those at "Wildwood" had been stricken with a plague. Francis ingratiated himself into the good graces of the "Wildwood" shepherd and rubbed culture into one or two animal's hides. When, some days later, Madame Remond learned from the shepherd that her prize animals were infected, she was grief-stricken. The shepherd had been attacked on his way with the news. Mr. Daubry went out, much against Renee's wishes, to learn the cause of the trouble.

High on a hillside stood a beautiful young woman in apparent distress. Daubry hastened to aid her. She immediately threw her arms about him and began to scream. In the twinkling of an eye, a mob of waiting peasants, led by Francis, seized Daubry and dragged him for endless minutes, until a steep declivity was reached. Then they hurled him down, down, down into a seemingly bottomless abyss. Here Renee and Madame Remond found him, hours later, barely conscious. While they were nursing him back to health, Francis' child became mortally ill. Denied money to get a doctor by his comrades, he appealed in desperation to Madame Remond, who forgivingly gave her medical skill to save its life. Daubry's health permitting, Madame, at the urging of Hormois, the notary, consented to sell her estate at an absurdly small price to "his client," and leave the neighborhood where she was so cordially disliked. Francis, learning that she contemplated this step, sought her out and made a full confession, implicating Hormois as the instigator of her misfortunes. Hormois fled in disgrace. At the village inn, Madame's household was being bitterly condemned for Hormois' disgrace when Francis entered. Flourishing his muscular arms, he challenged any and all to combat who had aught to say against the lady of "Wildwood." The tongue-waggers dispersed hurriedly.

A GOOD EYE and a STEADY AIM

are of no use if you are firing blank cartridges. Read this carefully if you are after REAL BULLETS that hit the BULL'S EYE of popular favor. The public likes a fad. They help make fads. The actor and actress playing in the pictures are known to your patrons. Many of them who are in the films and are not known by name have made their personalities known. YOUR PUBLIC would be attracted by a SOUVENIR POST CARD PICTURE of these performers. The FAD is here for keeps. The patrons of moving pictures are collecting them and OUR SEMI-PHOTO POST CARD is what they want, because they can obtain over 300 different players all the same style. The quality is the best and they include the very latest photographs of these performers. Give them away on off nights and matinees, and advertise them on your screen in advance, THEN WATCH YOUR BANK ROLL GROW.

Semi-Photo Post Cards, $3.00 per thousand; formerly sold for $4.00. Over 300 different players.

The NEW photo post cards which were recently noticed by the Moving Picture World, are now ready for distribution. They are made for hand coloring purposes, and where a very high class souvenir is desired, this card would create a furore. Each subject has the color of eyes and hair notated thereon in small type, so that the recipient can color them accurately. 15 men and 15 women, the most popular of the Association players — per thousand, $5.00.

Lobby frames to hold 12 pictures with necessary cards—$6.00 each.

Photographs for lobby display of the 2 & 3 reel features of Kalem, Lubin and Edison, and also all of the Mutual multiple reels—set of 6, $1.00. Set of 12, $2.00. Always ready 10 days ahead of release.

Colored Photos, size 11 x 14, for Lobby Display, of the following well-known players, $2.00 per set of eleven:

Arthur Johnson Maurice Costello John Bunny Lillian Walker
Ormi Hawley
Mary Pickford
Mary Fuller
Blanche Sweet
Gilbert M. Anderson
Carlyle Blackwell
Alice Joyce

This well-known style of picture, size 11 x 14 semi-photo, brown glazed finish, 43 different popular players, $1.00 per dozen. Former price, $2.00 per doz.

This is positively the last word in an artistically hand-colored picture for your lobby. Nothing could be produced that would add greater charm for decorative display.

SLIDES

This slide of Broncho Billy, for Advertisement and 15c. Send for list, General, Mutual and Universal players. We want to show you about our release slides for these three programs. They're just what you need. Sample for 20c. If you use one, you'll want them for every feature. You might just as well have the best slide made as any other. You'll get them of

The Niagara Slide Company
Lockport, New York

MAKE 'EM YOURSELF SLIDES

Make them yourself. Written with pen and ink or typewriter. Three minutes to make a slide. Used for advertising slides, to announce future or feature programmes, for chorus slides when chorus slide is missing. We send four colors of gelatin. The slides look well and anyone can make them. They are handy also for announcing vaudeville acts. In fact, they may be readily used for anything you may wish to say to your audience.

For the sum of $3.50 we will send, by parcel post, prepaid and insured, the following: 24 cover glass, 1 package binder strips, 1 dozen mats, 1 instruction sheet, 1 form sheet and 50 strips assorted colors gelatin—enough for from 300 to 400 slides. Order now. Address:

HE'S EAST, IS ONE ROUND O'BRIEN!

While HAMMERSTEIN'S, the great New York vaudeville theatre, makes his first picture the only film in a program of fifteen star vaudeville acts, One Round O'Brien slips East and celebrates his arrival with another picture of his famous "fakey" fighting.

Released Sunday, Oct. 19

There are No Favorites Like New Majestic Favorites!

Lamar Johnstone

is at his best in "THE WEDDING WRITE-UP," in one reel, out Sunday, Oct. 12th. He goes to a newspaper office to stop the "write-up" of his cancelled wedding to the "wrong" girl, and finds the society editress to be the "right" girl. If you see this reel you will understand why Lamar Johnstone stands high as a New Majestic favorite. Francelia Billington, the Louis Reeves Harrison "find," plays the editress. She shows you why she is a prime favorite, too. There are no favorites like New Majestic Favorites!

Billy Garwood

is too handsome for anything as the young man who is in love with the daughter of the losers of "THE VAN WARDEN RUBIES." This is in TWO REELS out Tuesday, Oct. 14th, (leaving the next release day, Saturday, the 18th, a "no-release" day because of Tuesday's extra reel). The Van Wardens miss the rubies at a week-end party they give at Pinehurst, their famous summer home. Prior to the discovery of the loss Phil Van Warden, the son, has lost heavily at cards, and the hand of suspicion points toward him. Then through love of Marietta, Phil's sister, and in the interests of justice, Billy Garwood accomplishes a neat piece of genuine detective work and catches the real crook. This two-reeler will make Garwood a greater favorite than ever before. There are no favorites like New Majestic Favorites!

There are No Multiple-Reel Favorites Like "Sapho"

(With Florence Roberts)

It is creating a furore everywhere in the big theatres of the country. No imported "feature" could have half its success, for it's a PRODUCTION, not a "feature." And big theatres want film PRODUCTIONS. This one, in six reels, has the best that famous Florence Roberts could give it from out of her wonderful experience in stage-production work. "Sapho" is coming down to the small theatres strengthened by its success in the large ones. Has your small theatre grabbed a date?

The Greatest Novelty Since the Invention of Motion Pictures

Here is a production so greatly in advance of anything heretofore attempted, as to mark a new epoch in motion pictures.

This KALEM feature, "MOTION PICTURE DANCING LESSONS," gives thoroughly practical instructions in the Tango, Turkey Trot, and the Viennese Hesitation Waltz.

MOTION PICTURE DANCING LESSONS

(Complete in Three Parts)

The instructors are Wallace McCutcheon and Miss Joan Sawyer, the sensations of the New York Theatre Roof Garden, and dancing teachers to the "400." Mr. McCutcheon and Miss Sawyer charge $25 for a single lesson in any one of the dances named. Your patrons get all three lessons complete for the price of an admission.

Tango, Turkey Trot, and Hesitation Waltz

Your patrons want this feature. First, because it is the greatest novelty of the age. Second, because it will help the most awkward of them to become perfect dancers. This feature was made especially for those people who "just can't learn," and for others who want to learn the latest New York dances. Special music with each film.

WITH A

POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH NO. 6A

ALL SEATS ARE EQUALLY GOOD

HAVE you ever noticed in some theatres (where they do not use Power's No. 6A) the first three or four rows are always vacant?

That is due to imperfect projection. The flicker is more pronounced when the picture is viewed at close range.

The projection of POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH NO. 6A renders a perfect picture without flicker, viewed from any part of the house. WITH IT, YOU CAN ALWAYS FILL YOUR HOUSE CLEAR UP TO THE SCREEN.

We Quote From Recent Letter:

Baltimore, Md.
No. 1115 S. Sharp St.
Sept. 19, 1913.

"We have your 6A machines with loop setter with direct current—and a silver curtain. What more does an operator want?

"Our pictures are clear, steady and flickerless. The front rows in our theatre, which are very seldom occupied in any theatre, are always filled.

"Very truly yours,
(Signed) "Fred Meister, Operator."

urges every theatre that does "good business" with a good feature to investigate the goodness of their FOUR-REEL Mutual specials.

"MOTHS" with Maude Fealy—and "ROBIN HOOD"

The stirring life of the great adventurer of the Middle Ages is here shown properly in black-and-white pictures for the first time. Every man, woman and child knows the story. This is the big, popular film of the Fall. See any Mutual Program or exchange for special terms.

"CAPE MAY" WEEK

Wherein two of the Three-A-Week are productions of the Cape May Company.

Sunday, Oct. 19

"THE BEAUTY IN THE SEASHELL"

She appears from her shell merely to make trouble for the man with the watchful sweetheart. For Beauty embraced the Man! In the end, the sweetheart discovered that her beau was in no way responsible. Made at Cape May by the now-famous Thanhouser Cape May Company, this "By-The-Sea" story is a thing of beauty and a joy forever!

Friday, Oct. 24

"THE OLD FOLKS AT HOME"

The whole adventure was started by a picture a "snap-shot" fiend took. It showed the old folks in their simple, old-home garb, and they sent it to their son in the city. He was wealthy and didn't like to see his parents dressed that way. He brought them on to his fashionable city home and into fashionable city dress, and then the blow off came.

Tuesday, Oct. 21

"THE MYSTERY OF THE HAUNTED HOTEL"

Another Cape May story, of a hotel down there that was long reported haunted. The result was bankruptcy for the unfortunate proprietor. Then a curious young physician came to stop at the place and didn't like the air of mystery. His curiosity set him searching for the spook, and he located it in the hotel man's own family!

COMING! Another "By-the-Sea" story from Cape May, "THE WATER CURE" (Sun., Nov. 2).

COMING! Riley Chamberlin, in "HOW FILMY WON HIS SWEETHEART" (Tues., Oct. 28).

COMING! Both the Kidlet and the Twins, in "THE CHILDREN'S HOUR," "JACK AND THE BEANSTALK," and "THEIR GREAT BIG, BEAUTIFUL DOLL," released in November.

Mr. O'Neill has caught the spirit that animates the hero of the tale. As Edmond Dantes he has the careless, droll humor and brusque heartiness characteristic of the honest sailor lad. As the Count his bearing assumes the finality and firmness befitting the man with but a single aim in life; and through all the phases of the character there runs that delicate vein which exalts Mr. O'Neill's effort to the dignity of a superbly harmonized artistic impersonation.

"The Pendulum of Fate"

Selig. Two Reels.

Released Oct. 27.

Lord Philip had to keep his marriage secret for twenty-five years. And when his father, the old Earl, finally died, his younger brother sought the title. Intrigue of the deepest character follows the thread of this picturesque production, until the family of the rightful heir comes into its own. Dramatic and impelling action.

"The Rajah's Diamond Rose"

Cines-Kleine. Two Reels.

Released Oct. 28.

The unscrupulous Count had a way of showing his friends his beautiful diamond rose and then leaving them alone with it. If they touched it, an automatic camera caught them red-handed and the Count asked big blackmail. The sister of a youth thus dishonored exposed the fraud—the diamond was bogus.

Motion Picture Dancing Lessons

Kalem. Three Parts.

Released Oct. 29.

Something brand new—the tango and the turkey-trot and the waltz taught by the screen. Wallace McCutcheon and Miss Joan Sawyer, whose dancing has been the feature of the New York Roof Garden this summer, appear in these interesting steps in Mr. McCutcheon's studio, his "Ecole du Danse." Special music with each film. A genuine sensation.

"When Childhood Wins"

Patheplay. Two Reels.

Released Oct. 29.

Against her father's will, a girl marries an artist. The angry father cuts her off. They are separated for years until her little daughter meets an old gentleman on the street and unknowingly captures her grandfather's heart. The reconciliation comes when the little girl falls ill. A wonderfully human, sympathetic story

"The Rattlesnake"

Lubin. Two Reels.

Released Oct. 30.

A weird story of a man's gratitude to a snake for saving his life. He takes the serpent home to live with him, and then conceives the idea of having the snake kill the man who won his sweetheart. He places it in the other man's bed. But when the little daughter of the girl he loved creeps into the bed, it is too much even for this half-demented creature. He saves her. Action? Whew!

"The Toll of the Marshes"

Essanay. Two Reels.

Released Oct. 31.

An interesting presentation of the land swindler evil. The company goes on selling swampland in place of farms until the president takes his family to the scene of his operations, where his little daughter is lost in the marshes. Then one of the victims proves his worth by risking his life to return the girl and restitution is made.

"Janet of the Dunes"

Edison. Two Reels.

Released Oct. 31.

Another brilliant feature by the author of "Joyce of the North Woods." This time the heroine is a girl of the surf-pounded beaches and the wind-swept dunes. She is reared by old Capt. Billy, who loved her mother. The girl delights in rummaging through the library of one of the wealthy summer residents. He finds her, and his friend, an artist, loves her. They find that the wealthy man is the girl's own father.

"The War Makers"

Vitagraph. Two Reels.

Released Nov. 1.

Here is diplomacy at its most exciting angle. The ambassador tricks the Secretary of War to bring the new war plans to a great dinner at the Embassy. Then all the guests receive a wine that contains "the sleeping death." The beautiful spy sails for Europe with the plans, but is caught by the cleverness of the Secretary's wife.

"Zuma the Gypsy"

(Copyright, 1913, by George Kleine)

POSITIVELY the most beautiful Cines subject offered the American market since "Quo Vadis?"

Zuma, a gypsy girl and a snake charmer, is purchased by a kindly hearted Count and his wife. Zuma's fidelity to her new masters and her dog-like devotion to the Countess is both uplifting and ennobling—one of the prettiest bits of character acting we have ever seen.

Zuma drives from the Count's home a woman friend of the Countess who flirts with the Count—and then comes the revelation that the faithful gypsy girl herself nurses an all-consuming love for the Count. Torn between her love for her mistress and her love for the Count, Zuma takes the road to death rather than prove unfaithful.

At a reception in the Count's home, Zuma does her snake dance. When the dance is done, Zuma turns the fangs of the gigantic python into her arm—a pathetic victim to her human love for the Count and her devotion to the Countess.

If you don't expect to receive "ZUMA THE GYPSY" you will miss a two-part masterpiece. James S. McQuade, critic for The Moving Picture World, thinks it the best Cines since "Quo Vadis?" So do we. Better book it and you will have booked a winner.

GEORGE KLEINE

HAS been hailed by critics as a master effort greater even than the wondrous "Quo Vadis?"

Through the beautiful, idle, slumbrous City of Pompeii, following closely the thread of a love tale idyllic, Lord Bulwer's mighty story sweeps on to scenes of almost preternatural power.

The destruction of Pompeii—the mad scurryings of the demented thousands amid a hail of smoking cinders and blasts of flame—the falling of great pillars—the collapse of temples—makes one feel that his ears ring with the shrieks of the terror-maddened multitudes of the stricken city.

These scenes of Pompeii's last day with their mighty, dramatic effect run for fifteen minutes—almost a thousand feet of awe-inspiring thrills!

"THE LAST DAYS OF POMPEII" was made at Turin and Pompeii, Italy. Nearly 5,000 people were employed in the making—a tremendous throng of daintily garbed, picturesque Italians.

From the Novel by Harriet T. Comstock

In Two Reels Released Friday, October 31st

John Devant flirted with lovely Mary Fleming all one summer, married her, and, tiring of her, soon deserted her. Mary went back to her little Long Island town, left baby Janet in care of faithful Captain Billy and flung herself into the sea. Janet, care-free as the wind, found an entrance into a deserted house—Devant's—where she used to read. One day Devant surprised her there and became interested in her, not knowing her identity. An artist friend of his painted Janet and became very much attached to her, although he did not realize it until he was dismissed after his fiancée had made a very disagreeable scene upon finding Janet waiting in the artist's studio. But the artist came back to Janet—floating on the wreckage of the ship in which he had set sail—and Devant, learning who Janet really was, swore to atone for the desertion of her mother.

Facts and Comments

AN esteemed contemporary proposes to send motion pictures of the recent parade of our cavalry in Washington to the warring factions in the republic of Mexico as an example and a warning. Not a bad idea, and quite a new illustration of the old principle of peace: "If you want peace, be ready for war."

* * *

A SOCIETY with the somewhat formidable title "The Anti Stage Jew Vigilance Committee" complains of stage ridicule of the Jew, and in a letter to The Moving Picture World a member of this committee states "that while the films have been comparatively free from this abuse, yet there have been a few films of late ridiculing the Jew." We have on more than one occasion pointed out the bad taste and business folly of ridiculing nationalities or races as such. Every nationality has foibles and weaknesses, but it is always hard to see those of one's own nationality while it is easy to laugh at those of the others. The "comic" picture which has no other claim on the appreciation of an audience than the ridicule heaped upon a certain nationality ought to be barred forever.

QUITE a number of clergymen are "discovering" the motion picture. They consider their discovery as unquestionably original, and are not a little proud of their cleverness. One reverend gentleman in a New England town has established what he not inaptly calls a Civic Theater, and he hopes to do much good; indeed, he has done much good. In congratulating the theater and its management, may we be allowed to call attention to the fact that with but few exceptions every motion picture theater in the country has a civic and educational value and an effect far above the mere object of amusing and entertaining people. We most assuredly rejoice in seeing the motion picture installed in churches or in places with an educational mission, but it must not be forgotten that good pictures shown to the promiscuous audiences in our great motion picture theaters have just the same effect as good pictures shown in a church. Thus the effect of good pictures is felt in daily widening circles.

PERHAPS we have overlooked the true cause of the inundation of bad plays making a specialty of exhibiting the details of the commercialization of vice. The phenomenon is a most unusual one and offers somewhat of a psychological riddle. Lewd plays are nothing new in the history of human amusements, and the immoral play has had its vogue at various times. Never before, however, has the trading in human vice and weakness been carried on more frankly than recently on Broadway in New York. Is this due to the despair of theatrical managers who try this last desperate expedient to draw audiences away from the motion picture theater? Do they fondly imagine that they will get the crowds by removing the veil from all human depravity and errors? The result seems to show a miscalculation on their part. Instead of attracting the crowds, they have succeeded in attracting the police.

Happily there is little danger that the motion picture will follow even one step in the direction in which these managers and magnates have chosen to travel. There are two specially good reasons for this. In the first place, the exhibitor of motion pictures is far more amenable to his patrons than the manager of a theater. The exhibitor himself realizes this direct responsibility which the play on the screen imposes upon him. In the majority of cases is he personally present at some time during his show, and he is generally known to most of his patrons. He would not care to face his audience after an exhibition of a play like some of the productions now rampant in Broadway theaters. The second reason against the vogue of plain indecency on the screen lies in the fact that the motion picture art for all its expression must rely on other things than the voice. The dialogue softens the offensive passages and palliates exhibitions which unexplained and expressed solely through the medium of the gesture and the play of the facial register would at once become intolerable. The modern Circe, dressed in dollar bills, walking up and down the theatrical highways seeking whom she may change into groveling swine, cannot ply her deadly wand on either the producer or the exhibitor of motion pictures. There may have been some danger from the influx of certain European "features," but it will not be long before Uncle Sam will take a hand and prevent the landing of undesirables of this variety. Thus the outlook for pictures free from the sex problem taint is quite encouraging.

From Master Minds

By Louis Reeves Harrison

WHATEVER the relations between dramas of the stage and those of the screen, and whatever the relations that exist between either and literature, it is interesting to hear occasionally from men of undoubted ability who have given serious thought to the interweaving influences of these arts. Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson, one of the most intelligent performers of today and any other day, has recently supported the advanced views of dramatist Henry Arthur Jones on what constitutes the right sort of entertainment for a mixed audience of English-speaking people.

"The stage," said Sir Johnston in a New York Times interview of October 5th, "is the proper medium for the advertising of certain ideas concerning life; it should represent life in all its manifold complexities. And the great difference I find between the theater of my early day and the theater of the present is that there is now a more generous sweep of subjects to be treated. The dramatist through the actor can drive home truths, can see that these truths reach home. People once laughed at the theater as an educational institution, but the social conscience is more alive than it used to be. The topic of the hour is the vital topic for the theater."

I have given only a few excerpts from this interview, but I have cited more than appears at a glance. Let us apply to screen presentations what exhibits "life in all its manifold complexities," and to the view of millions we immediately open up subjects of absorbing interest merely glimpsed on the threshold of mental life, all the wondrous phases of thought undercurrents, upheavals of the subconscious, bright resurrections of dull natures and fascinating explorations in the evolution of personality. These are now live subjects for the novelist and dramatist—why should they not be profoundly interesting in screen representations?

What we are getting in moving pictures is reiteration of all that is becoming dull and commonplace, though no reason exists why we should not have "a more generous sweep of subjects" except a habit of repetition which is settling down upon producers. Most of them are engaged in doing what has been done before in one shape or another, in many cases done to death, instead of "responding to the abundant energy and youth of the nation, its ceaseless and varied activities, its thirst for knowledge." This habit of copying comes from a sense of security that there is money in the game, that almost any old film can be made to pay under present methods.

It is all right to make money, but there will be greater gain for those who push on to the front with an unsurpassed quality of product, with photodramas reaching out to the social conscience, which "is more alive than it used to be." We need producers unafraid to venture upon the vast and complex social and political questions of the hour, to attempt what magazines of tremendous circulation are trying to do, to deal with vital and interesting subjects, "to drive home truths and see that these truths reach home." The topic of the hour is the vital topic for the screen.

Whatever the primitive passions, there are reigning methods of their expression. Whatever the characters of a generation ago, we know very well that there has been development since then. Whatever the form and treatment of stories written twenty years back, changes in both have been taking place. Successful photodrama must take people out of our real world as we know it and either depict them faithfully or according to modern ideals.

Said Henry Arthur Jones, one of the greatest of English dramatists, in a lecture delivered at Yale: "A dramatist, a novelist, is never so effective, so life-like, so truly creative, as when he is drawing the men and women amongst whom he has lived and unconsciously studied. The self-conscious ex officio production of masterpieces is often a terribly wearisome and unprofitable business." After paying his compliments to those who attempted to profit by reflected glory in adapting the form and not the real substance of noted authors, the distinguished playwright has a word to say about a kind of drama that has been one of the greatest bores of screen presentation. He thus refers to one stupid idea of producers:

"It is the notion that a costume play, a play whose scenes are laid anywhere, does by that very act acquire a merit, a distinction, a profound significance, which rank it above the play of modern everyday life. Many costume plays have been produced with success in days gone by, but most of them are but sorry pieces of fustian and artifice. When such very fine clothes are worn, when such heroic sentiments are paraded, such gallant deeds done, such wasteful feats of self-sacrifice performed under our very eyes, I fear it shows a churlish spirit to call for any truth in the production, fidelity in the characterization, or of common sense in the whole scheme."

We need a new word, something like "intense-drama," to distinguish plays of power, high moments of suspense and deep feeling from what has now come to be known as "melodrama" pure and simple. Henry Arthur Jones has this to say on the subject: "I will give you a rule to judge whether or not a play should be called melodrama, using the word in a contemptuous sense. When you see a play of stirring scenes and situations, do not ask yourself if they occur at an impossibly rapid rate—they are sure to do that if the play is interesting—but ask yourself how far they are rooted in and spring from character; how far they are allied to the exhibition and development of character; how much real living human character you have seen displayed and illustrated in these strong situations.

"Strong scenes and situations that are filled with puppets are rightly called melodrama. But strong scenes and situations that exhibit fresh and living human characters are not justly called melodrama, merely because, for the sake of the spectator, they are placed before him in an impossibly rapid sequence, and to that extent give the impression of unreality." This helps, but it refers to stage drama, where the use of coincidence is often essential because of time and space limitations—an entire group is carried from one act to another in scenes far removed.

These men of unquestioned ability have given serious thought to the requirements of English-speaking audiences, and they confirm in a general way what I have long been urging as desirable in screen production, the more that the latter are not hampered by the limitations of stage plays. There will be a vast improvement shown in the presentation of intense photodramas, the kind most in present demand, when the topic is vital and attention to characterization transfigures the whole art into a thing of truth portrayal and enduring charm.

Educational Catalogues—I

By W. Stephen Bush

IF it were true that "the university of today is a collection of good books," then it were likewise true that the university of tomorrow will be a collection of good motion pictures. Like a good many other smart and pointed sayings, the claim that a good collection of books may become a substitute for a university is based on a half truth and rests therefore on the most insecure of foundations. More is needed to the training of the mind than a collection of books and pictures. The contact with living mental forces is at the foundation of all knowledge. Books and pictures are merely aids to education. The motion picture is the latest and the best aid for a variety of reasons. Its appeal to the senses is the most direct and forcible, it insures at the very outset the good-will and interest of the pupil and makes the process of mental absorption easy and pleasant. The present-day schoolroom is too often a place of torture; the mind is whipped and drilled and discipline often hurts the eagerness of the pupil to learn. The motion picture administers the gentlest kind of mental massage and saves a vast amount of time, especially in what we call the primary grades of instruction.

It is most natural, therefore, that every step forward and upward in the development of the educational picture should be watched with the greatest care and interest. This is the hour of the laying of the cornerstone; this is the day when we are making our appeal to educators on behalf of the educational motion picture.

The only way we can let the educators and the public generally know what we have in the way of educational pictures is through catalogues. The catalogue is our show window. We will be judged by our catalogues. The way we prepare our catalogues will show what we have and how we manage to display what we have. If our catalogues are prepared in a slovenly and incompetent way, the progress of the educational picture as a reality will be slow. If the catalogues are comprehensive and clear in details as they ought to be, then teachers the country over will take notice and the advance of the motion picture as a recognized medium of imparting knowledge will be rapid.

It is scarcely necessary to say that these words are not in any way intended as a comment or criticism on any catalogues now existing. Recognizing the importance of cataloguing in the most effective and useful manner possible, we offer with becoming diffidence a few suggestions to the busy exchange man or producer who may be called upon or who may deem it proper to make a full and easily understood record of all his educational releases.

It must be remarked at the outset that the methods of cataloguing a library differ widely from the system of cataloguing which will do the most and the best for the motion picture. The reasons are obvious. In the first place, we have been printing books for more than half a thousand years, while the making of even occasional pictures of distinct educational value has only been going on for the past half a dozen years. The catalogue of the well-equipped library therefore covers every conceivable department of human knowledge, while the motion picture has so far confined itself to comparatively few subjects. If we were to follow the catalogue system of libraries in arranging and displaying our educational pictures, there would be on the one hand too many blank pages and on the other hand an overcrowding of other pages. The thing would look ridiculous and it would mean the printing of a very poor and almost useless catalogue.

The fact is we must have a system of cataloguing especially adapted to the motion picture in general and especially adapted to the present supply of motion pictures in particular. Let us then at once understand that the true foundation of all higher and valuable knowledge is a just sense of proportion. The catalogue must be built upon a properly trained sense of proportion, which knows how to adjust values.

I repeat: We can never do justice to the motion picture by following the system of cataloguing books. The best proof lies in the utter unfitness of the Dewey Decimal System for a proper classification of motion pictures of an educational value. The Dewey system, devised and introduced in our libraries by Melville Dewey, formerly State librarian of New York, fits the motion picture just about as snugly as a stout man's size would fit a slender youth. It has, however, one highly commendable feature which might well be copied by the cataloguer of educational pictures, and that is the decimal system. Indeed, the decimal system will be more of a success in the educational exchange than in the average library. In order, however, to make the decimal principle available for the motion picture, the Dewey division of subjects will have to be revised and recast and a new order of subjects which more truly displays the present supply of educational pictures will have to be substituted. The Dewey decimal system makes it easy for the librarian to arrange his books and shelves. He knows exactly what subject ends with 499 and what subject begins with 500. The advantages, therefore, of a decimal system of cataloguing to the exchange man and producer is obvious. His reels are more bulky and heavy than the books of the librarian, and any system which makes distribution and arrangement easy and which saves a lot of space is of distinct practical value.

It is of value not only to the exchange man and the producer but of equal benefit to the exhibitor and to the ever-increasing number of people who begin to use motion pictures for educational purposes. The catalogue of educational pictures must make it easy to find what the prospective user of the picture is looking for. This means that the advantages of decimal division will only accrue when the division of subjects is suitable for the motion picture supply now on hand. It therefore means that the cataloguer will have to take as complete a survey as possible of the materials now on hand and adjust his division of subjects accordingly. To exemplify: The Library Catalogue now in general use has among its ten Grand Divisions the following: General Works, Philosophy, and Philology. By General Works is mainly meant Bibliography and Laws. It is evident that the cataloguer of motion pictures has no use for these subjects. Philology, the science of words, cannot at present, at least, be considered within the scheme of kinematographic education. The same holds true of what under the Dewey system is known as General Works or as Philosophy. Attempts to fill in these subjects with any part of the present supply of educational pictures would be ridiculous.

In my next article I propose to work out a system of arranging and cataloguing motion pictures which will retain all the advantages of the decimal system while it will also present a new and I trust a better scheme of the arrangement of subjects than would be possible by following the rules of cataloguing now observed in libraries.

A Powerful Three-Reel Vitagraph.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison

THIS is an intense drama of today, with some highly sensational and costly scenes in the third reel. It contains so many aspects of life and character that we long to see in strong photodramas, that I will give the author's name. It is so admirably handled that I will give that of the director. The acting is so remarkable and the types so well chosen that I would like to give the entire cast, but there is space only for the principals.

Author, Marguerite Bertsch
Director, Ralph Ince

Cast:

|---|---|
| Wilbur Hamilton | Donald Hall |
| Richard, his son | E. K. Lincoln |
| Sanford Carlyle | Harry T. Morey |
| Herbert, his profligate son | Gladden James |
| Carlyle's young wifeHerbert's stepmother | Anita Stewart |

Sanford Carlyle is a railroad President, a man of vast and complicated nervous structure as conceived by the author and as depicted in masterly fashion by Harry Morey. The author has given the actor the opportunity of his life, and he has not failed in the portrayal of human passions and human feelings that flame out at high moments, smoldering meanwhile, yet ever in evidence after misconception of a simple act leads to one dramatic situation after another. The influence of his wealth and the force he exerts as the head of a great enterprise—the destinies of many men and women hinge upon his temperamental peculiarities—make him an autocrat. His will is absolute.

Whatever the original pattern of such a man, it becomes one of authority, not subject to restriction, until he assumes unlimited power in his social relations. He comes to believe that he has an inherent right to gratify his passions and desires as he may choose, with small consideration for others or for the consequences of his acts. We instinctively recognize such a character as a real one. He is the instrument of his ungoverned individuality, bound to act in a given way at a given time. He may be clean in his domestic relations, honest in business, carry himself with dignity as long as he is not crossed, but an outburst of suspicion and hate will sweep away his abstract perceptions of what is right or wrong and cause him to express the primitive passions of his sex. He becomes the more dangerous as a menace to society in that he operates with trained intelligence.

Such is the conception of the talented author—one extracted by observation from real life and transformed by her creative imagination into one of high dramatic utility. Her idea is bound to win because, no matter how this or that critic may regard a play, all judgments incline toward a character picture drawn from what is universally recognized to be true of such a man in such an environment. He cannot do other than respond to the directive influences of his character and his circumstances in combination. The author has created a play that meets the audience on common ground, one that will succeed quite as well abroad as at home.

The railway magnate has what most of us imagine should make a man contented with his lot. He has a lovely young wife, a beautiful home, wealth far beyond his needs, vigorous health and a position of great influence. The only thorn in his side is a profligate son by his first wife. This son has been indulged, is the creature of a pampered existence, and yields weakly to the temptations of a fast set at college. The railroad president does what most of us do, shuts his eyes to the abundant happiness within reach and occupies his mind with a remote and curable misery. He takes into his employ the winning and manly son of his old friend Hamilton, and thus creates a new misery.

Richard Hamilton is thrown constantly into the society of Carlyle's young wife, and becomes her confidant in an attempt she makes to extricate her stepson from serious difficulties. She intrusts him with a delicate and difficult mission, that of helping her husband's wayward boy in secret. She arouses her husband's suspicions by her conduct—it is open to misconstruction through the very simplicity of her nature—and the guilt that is in him, the distrust of human nature he has exhibited all his life, his lack of belief in the good will of others, fan all the flames of jealousy in his nature. His innate recognition that young Hamilton is a splendid fellow makes the feeling more bitter than if he was dealing with an inferior.

The Immortal Bard says: "Suspicion always haunts a guilty mind." The growth of suspicion is admirably depicted until it becomes passionate aversion. The railroad president's hatred for young Hamilton becomes so active that it is all but avowed. It becomes cowardly when he shadows his young wife and insane when he discovers that she has made an appointment to meet Hamilton at a railway station near a lake. He follows the young man and commits murder under dominance of his crazed impulses, throws his supposed rival into the water and watches him sink out of sight.

There is immediate reaction. His own son comes upon the scene and makes it known that he was to have met Hamilton. The autocrat suffers intense mental torture when he learns that the young man he has killed came on a mission of mercy to save his dissolute son. This torture is gradually increased when the drowned man's body is brought to his house, when he is forced to summon the dead boy's father, when he is compelled to witness the father's grief. He believes himself to be safe, however, until a yard hand, discharged for drunkenness, demands reinstatement and reveals that he witnessed the murder.

Destiny has taken a hand in the shaping of events. A murderer of prominent social or business position is rarely punished—it is next to impossible to prove his guilt and never on the unsupported evidence of a discharged employee. The murderer lives on, more terribly punished than he could have been by law. His son becomes redeemed and exceedingly dear to the wretched father. Yet that son is killed before his very eyes in a train wreck caused by retaining the drunken engineer. Retributive justice seems best achieved in the final tragedy, one of the most realistic scenes of horror ever shown on the screen. The entire creation is a credit to the art and to all the various factors in its production.

"The Boomerang" (Essanay)

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

A WELL constructed scenario, skillful production, a strong and capable cast and photography of good quality are all present in Essanay's two-reel feature, "The Boomerang," which will be released November 14. One cannot fail to be impressed by the imposing interior views in this subject and by the pleasing light effects showing night scenes. Director McRae Webster is to be commended for the care shown in making the settings fitting for the events of the story. The residence of the Secretary of War is a stately structure viewed from without, and its handsome interior and rich furnishings are in harmony with the position of the owner and the refinement of the family and their guests.

The pictures tell the story connectedly; but, it seems to me, that part of it which deals with the flight of Maxwell, the dishonest clerk, with the supposed "key" to the drawings in his possession, would have been revealed more clearly had his accomplices in the waiting automobile been shown in conversation with Maxwell, shortly before he enters the Secretary's private study to abstract the "key" from the safe. I failed to comprehend the true meaning until my second view of the films.

The cast has been happily selected. Miss Irene Warfield, a new Essanay lead, gives great promise as a successful photo-dramatic actress by her spirited, forceful acting in the role of Irene, daughter of the Secretary of War. Working at certain angles from the camera lens, Miss Warfield's charm of face was marred by a faulty make-up, which is evidenced by plainly visible streaks on such occasions.

Thomas Commerford gives a dignified, finished impersonation of the Secretary of War. It is a model in character drawing. E. H. Calvert, in his dual personality of trusted official member of the Secretary and one of a band of conspirators, shows his customary convincing skill and art as an actor. The arch-plotter, who plans the stealing of precious government drawings, finds an able exponent in Jules Ferrar. The surprise and arrest of the plotter and his accomplices by the Secretary and the police is a realistic scene, the struggle being excellently simulated. This and other fine acting passages in the production bear the marks of careful and painstaking rehearsal. The closing scene, in which Irene, in the presence of her father, renounces her dishonorable lover, is a fitting climax to an exciting story.

The Secretary of War of a certain power receives the drawings of a new type of aeroplane, specially designed for war purposes. The drawings are accompanied by a "key," without which they are useless. At a night meeting of the Secretary's official staff, the drawings are examined. Unknown to the minister, his trusted secretary is the sworn member of a band of plotters, headed by the emissary of an unfriendly power. The drawings disappear and the minister is in despair. The false secretary has secreted them under the carpet, and is the first to request that all present be searched. The "key," however, remains, but the government of the Secretary of War warns him that the drawings must be restored under pain of dismissal. He takes his daughter, Irene, into his confidence and she resolves to unravel the mystery.

The following night, while watching the room where the drawings disappeared, Irene sees a man enter and take the drawings from underneath the carpet. She cannot see his face and the man disappears quickly down a corridor. She flashes the lights and summons the household. The false secretary, who had just abstracted the drawings, accosts her with her father and others. Needless to say, pursuit is fruitless. Immediately afterward, the false secretary hurries to the rendezvous and turns over the drawings to his accomplices. Then it is discovered that the "key" is missing, and it must be had at all hazards.

Irene knows that the thief will return for the "key" and, arming herself, she sits alone in the room awaiting him. The long hours of waiting make her feel drowsy; and, while napping, the false secretary takes the revolver and empties it, as he thinks, of all the cartridges. Then he opens the safe and secures the "key." Some sound made by him awakens Irene and she pursues him as he exits madly through the door. She follows him desperately, firing the revolver all the time. Just as the thief is about to climb over the front wall, he receives a bullet wound in the leg. He had left one cartridge in the revolver by an oversight. Irene pursues him closely and, in the end, the conspirators are seized by the police. The false secretary, who had won her love, is saved from arrest and the wrath of her father by Irene's intercession.

PICTURES OF FIGHTING IN MACEDONIA.

Special Note From Paris.

Mr. Robert, the well-known cinematographer, has just returned to Paris after having accompanied the Greek army during the last part of the war in Macedonia. Mr. Robert left in response to a telegram from the King of Greece. He was given every facility for securing moving pictures of life at the front and has secured a remarkable six-thousand-foot film of the Greeks at war. Mr. Robert went through every conceivable hardship to obtain his pictures, many of which he took under a hail of shrapnel and bullets. He was fortunate enough to obtain photographs of a shell bursting and falling amid a Greek battery. Another part of the film depicts the work of the ambulance corps and shows the effects of "dum-dum" bullets in a man's arm. The whole film is a remarkable record of a modern war. Mr. Roberts claims that this film is absolutely unique.

ALL STAR'S TREASURER EUROPE BOUND.

When Philip Klein, treasurer of the All Star Feature Corporation, sails for Europe on the Mauretania next Wednesday (October 22) he will go prepared to spend some very busy weeks in England and on the continent. Primarily Mr. Klein's trip is taken to secure some of the great works of noted foreign authors for film production by the All Star Feature Corporation. He will also treat with some of the most distinguished dramatic stars of England and the continent regarding their appearance in great feature films to be made by the All Star. With both authors and stars negotiations have already been opened by correspondence. Augustus Thomas will personally supervise the staging of all plays secured.

"An Hour Before Dawn"

Miss Laura Sawyer Scores a Success in a Three-Reel Detective Story with the Famous Players.

By George Blaisdell.

MR. DAWLEY, director of Famous Players' productions, is a keen plotter of detective stories. He has the faculty of concealing until such time as he sees fit to disclose it the identity of the criminal, if criminal there be; or, as in the case of "An Hour Before Dawn," showing that there is no criminal and that the death over which the police have been so much concerned was due to accidental causes. In writing a story for the Famous Players Mr. Dawley has a decided advantage over the common every-day garden sort of photoplaywright in that he produces his own picture, which is of course a decided advantage—in some ways. It leaves him no room, however, to say when speaking as the author, and as other authors have been known to say: "The story was simply fine, you know, up to the time the director got hold of it—and then things happened." In the picture under review there is no cause for complaint on the part of one against the other. The story is different. In one way it resembles the Kate Kirby pictures which Mr. Dawley produced for the Edison Company; there is plenty of opportunity for the exercise of wits in figuring out what really happened and how the case is going to end. Mr. Dawley plainly is a believer in the policy of giving the man watching the picture something besides amusement, knowing that he who is successful in solving in advance the mystery that is puzzling the police will have cause for self-congratulation. In "An Hour Before Dawn" a scientist engaged in experiments on an explosive ray is found dead. The previous evening his son and heir had quarreled with him about an actress. In the house there is found a pistol with one unexploded cartridge, but with the bullet missing. The death is caused by a missile of the same caliber. Here is the first real clue.

Scene from "An Hour Before Dawn" (Famous Players).

Scene from "An Hour Before Dawn" (Famous Players).

The story, which is in three reels, is cleverly constructed and holds the attention closely. Miss Laura Sawyer, as Kate Kirby, the detective daughter of the paralytic ex-detective (well played by House Peters), is most interesting in her portrayal of the woman doing police work. She seems to bring to her duties more than police instinct and that which of course no man can bring—a woman's intuition. She has splendid support. The introduction, in which Miss Sawyer's face appears in a black background and an invisible pencil writes "Laura Sawyer as Kate Kirby," is novel and effective. The production is notable for the police atmosphere, from the time when the police are summoned to the home of the wealthy astronomer lying dead in his study to the successful demonstration by Kate Kirby of the forces that accomplished the professor's destruction. We see the men of the law searching the house for clues, questioning the members of the household and the son, and holding consultations. We see the working of the notorious third degree, which of course is without the law and yet is always defended by every policeman as being as essential in the ferreting out of crime as it is brutal in method of execution. The means employed by Kate Kirby in solving the mystery are logical and convincing.

The settings are elaborate. One of the best is the observatory and laboratory of the scientist, containing the great telescope. The views of the heavens thrown on the screen are from actual photographs taken by one of the country's foremost astronomers. The engine of destruction on which the professor was working is an elaborate contrivance. One of the effective scenes is where the servant discovers the body of his employer. He throws back the curtains from the window and lets in the glow of the dawn. One of the strongest dramatically is where the actress, who has confessed the commission of the crime in order to save her lover, the son of the dead man, thinking he really killed his father, is confronted in the station by her sweetheart. He denounces her. It is a severe blow. Dumbly she picks up the handcuffs and restores them to her wrists. The action of the two convinces Kate Kirby of the innocence of both. It is then she gets on the right track. There is much strength also in the final scenes. The woman detective has found a memorandum giving instructions for operating the invention of the professor. In the presence of the detectives and the accused she follows out the directions contained in the slip and produces a violent explosion. Then the lovers are reunited. Kate is patted on the back by the phlegmatic police chief.

"An Hour Before Dawn" is a good picture—and one of the many factors contributing to this end is the steadily sustained interest. The acting and direction are excellent, and so of course is the photography.

SCREEN CLUB IN NEW HOME.

October 14, was moving day for the Screen Club. Having outgrown its old shell at 45th Street, New York, it graduated into a splendid mansion at 165 West 47th Street; like Longfellow's "Chambered Nautilus," whereof the poet sang: "Build me more noble mansions, O my soul!" (Some simile there, playmates.)

The Screeners never realized how much furniture they owned until they saw it fill many van loads, and nearly fill the handsome four story brown front building into which it has moved. As it stands now, there is almost too much furniture because the house was leased with furnishings. These include many handsome oil paintings, bronzes and hangings, as well as luxurious rugs, carved furniture and expensive chandeliers. The house is more than ordinarily well decorated, it having been at one time a rendezvous for speculative gentlemen.

In the lower or street floor will be a grill and cafe, finished in the mission style. The parlor floor will be devoted to reception and writing rooms. The entire second floor will be cleared for a billiard and shuffle board room. The top floor will remain divided into rooms as it is at present. One room will be reserved for the executive offices and the others will be used as playrooms for the boys, where they may indulge in leap-frog, blind-man's-buff, old maid, Casino, checkers, dominoes and other indoor sports.

The date for the formal opening and housewarming has not yet been decided upon, but will be announced just as soon as the new club rooms have been put in readiness. It is a splendid place and one to which any member would not hesitate to ask the most distinguished of guests. Thus in less than one year from the opening of its first quarters, the Screen Club advances to the front rank of theatrical social organizations with a domicile second to none.

"The Passerby"

Warren Kerrigan Gives a Pleasing Impersonation in a Victor Release—Good Supporting Cast.

By George Blaisdell.

Under the Victor brand the Universal Company will release on October 24th an entertaining two-reel picture featuring Warren Kerrigan, one of the recent acquisitions to the company's playing forces. Mr. Kerrigan used to give much attention to "Western" stuff—as was quite natural, considering that was the particular kind of pictures his employer was at the time making. Those who were accustomed to seeing him in the older days will undoubtedly like him better in parts such as the Wanderer in the picture under review. The period of the play is ante-bellum, in the days when men were picturesquely garbed and the women perhaps less so than to-day. Let us not complain too much as to the latter, however, in these times of crowded conveyances.

Scene from "The Passerby" (Victor).

"The Passerby" is a pretty story with a thrill at the end. It is the sort of thrill one feels at beholding an action that marks a man as a good sport, to speak in the vernacular; in other words, to be a graceful loser, even when a woman is the stakes. Mr. Kerrigan has a role of an adventurer—one of the genteel sort. He is invited to sit down at a lawn party in order to avoid the thirteen-at-table superstition. He had stopped to request a glass of water and had been given wine. There are a number of happenings in the ensuing day or two, in all of which the Passerby figures. He befriends first the father of the young woman who sent him the wine, "finding" money with which to pay a pressing debt and getting it to the recipient without uncovering the giver. He is insulted and accommodatingly fights a duel, after raising and restoring in novel manner the money he had stolen. The act of taking the money is not at all clear, due probably to the fear of the censorship board on the part of the director.

The support of Mr. Kerrigan is excellent. Jessalyn Van Trump plays Betty; George Periolat the Colonel, her father; William Walters the Squire, William Worthington Mr. Klein, and Richard Rosson is Joe, the youth. The photography and settings are good. James Neill is the producer.

REISINGER THE FIRST TO REDUCE.

With the passing of the new tariff law with its consequent reduction of the duty on carbons, Hugo Reisinger, of 11 Broadway, New York, importers of the Electra Pink Label Carbons, was, upon his own initiative, the first carbon importer to give the exhibitor the full benefit of this reduction. This will be welcome news to all users of projection carbons. The new and lower rate is set forth in Mr. Reisinger's advertisement in this issue.

STREYCKMANS WITH PILOT.

H. J. Streyckmans is now the manager of the Pilot studio and factory at Yonkers, N. Y. The Pilot Company has under way some pretentious projects and will release nothing but big productions.

"London By Night"

A Four Part Melodrama by Barker That Is Full of Thrills—Will Be Marketed by P. P. Craft.

THOUGH much vilified in the past, the British picture producer is fast gaining a reputation on this side of the big water for creditable work in the cinematographic line. Only recently the Moving Picture World had occasion to remark the sterling qualities of a Hepworth production entitled "David Copperfield," a picture, by the way, that eclipses every attempt by American producers to visualize the same subject. Now comes Barker with a melodramatic four part feature with a good story to justify it, strengthened by good work on the part of the players.

Briefly the story is that of a young man, the son of the wealthy Sir John Ralston and heir to Ralston Towers. He comes down from Oxford and meets his father's ward, Mary Lucas, with whom he falls in love much to his father's delight. Shortly afterward the son goes to London to study law with a chum who leads him into bad company. Becoming infatuated with an adventuress, he neglects his sweetheart. Sir John and Mary go to London to find out what is the matter with Dick and surprise him at one of his revels in the embraces of the adventuress, whereupon Sir John disowns him and cuts him off in his will. Shortly afterward Sir John dies and leaves all his property to his ward, who tries to win back Dick, but fails and then decides to become a nurse, refusing to accept the wealth tendered her by Sir John's will.

Scene from "London By Night" (Apex).

Dick returns to London and goes the pace. He bets heavily on the races and is ruined financially, which causes the adventuress to throw him over for another. Following the final scene at the home of this woman a burglar enters her chamber; the woman is killed in the struggle and Dick is suspected of the crime. He escapes capture and wanders about London and finally lands on the Thames embankment where chance brings him into the company of the real murderer whom he accompanies to a cheap lodging house. That night there is a fight among the frequenters of the place and it is set on fire. Dick awakes to find himself cut off from escape, but with his new found companion is saved by the firemen and taken to the hospital. Fatally injured the real murderer confesses and Dick is reunited with Mary, who is a nurse in this particular hospital.

There are a number of strong scenes in this picture. The affair at the home of the adventuress, when the burglar enters and kills the woman in the struggle, though gruesome, is well acted. The burning of the lodging house is a strong scene, despite the fact that there is evidence that the house is of "property" construction. A steeplechase in the third part is an interesting event—a real race which the producer took for the purpose of the picture. It will be noticed throughout this subject that adequate attention has been given to all the scenic effects; that none have been slighted in the least particular.

To this add the careful rendition of each player's part and you have a picture that commands attention.

CHICAGO LETTER

by JAS. S. McQUADE

THEATER VENTILATION IN COURT.

Chicago Exhibitors Resist Action By the Board of Health.

IN the last issue I stated that the Washington Theater, 4370 Cottage Grove Avenue, owned by C. C. Whelan, was closed on Saturday, October 4, by Health Commissioner Young. The following Monday a mandamus was secured which permitted Mr. Whelan to reopen his house, and on Tuesday, October 7, an injunction was issued by Judge P. McGoorty, of the Superior Court, restraining the health commissioner from interfering with the operation of the theater.

On hearing of the injunction, Dr. Young issued a statement in which he complained that the health department had received no preliminary notice of the action. "The health department will commence proceedings at once, and if necessary, will carry the case to the Supreme Court," said Dr. Young. "There is no pending issue of more vital and immediate interest to the citizens of Chicago than the question, 'Shall the foul air theaters be permitted to operate?'"

Judge McGoorty told the commissioner that the issuance of such a statement was improper, that it would probably prejudice the city's case and that it barely escaped being contempt of court.

Dr. Young replied that the statement contained nothing but facts and that he had not intended any discourtesy to the court.

On Saturday, October 11, the Star Theater on Milwaukee Avenue, owned by Fred. W. Schaefer, and the Palace Theater, 12th Street and Blue Island Avenue, owned by Ellis Glickman, were closed by order of the health commissioner. The Star was opened soon afterwards, it being shown that the intentions of Mr. Schaefer were to comply with the ventilation ordinance, plans which had been prepared for the required changes being submitted to the commissioner. It is expected that the proprietors of all moving picture theaters closed by the health department will secure injunctions against the city, pending the trial of the various cases.

It is rumored that five houses were singled out by the health department to test the validity of the ventilation ordinance. Mr. Whelan states that Dr. Hill, one of Dr. Young's assistants, acknowledged that he, Mr. Whelan, had been selected as the first "goat," as he could not plead poverty, and the department had no desire to inflict hardship on any exhibitor.

Mr. Whelan's theater, the Washington, is patronized by bankers, business and professional men and others, and at no time has there been any complaint from his patrons. In his recent trouble, prominent citizens immediately drew up and signed a petition to the city authorities in his favor. Mr. Whelan is just as much in favor of fresh air in his theater as is Dr. Young, but he opposes the enforcement of an ordinance that requires a special ventilation device in his house, no matter how good the present ventilation may be. This is the stand of all intelligent exhibitors. Of course, there are theaters in which the ventilation is poor, and the present agitation will compel them to improve conditions or close.

I know a theater on the North Side which has ventilation of such approved merit that, all through the hot summer, patrons flocked to it, not only for its fine programs, but because they found greater comfort within its doors than could be found outside. The proprietor of this theater has been informed that he must install the new ventilating system approved by the health department, although the change will mean an expenditure of over $3,000, with no improvement whatever on his present ventilating system. It is firmly believed by exhibitors that the courts will not sustain the health department in any such case.

The meeting called for Friday, October 10, for members of the exhibitors' association and the building committee of the city council, at which it was sought to have the amendment of the theater ventilation ordinance repealed, was called off until the Friday following.

The case of the Washington Theater will be called in the near future, in Judge McGoorty's court.

Major Dickson's Instructive Military Pictures.

The fifteenth annual convention of the National Guard Association of the United States was opened at the Congress Hotel, this city, October 6, being announced as one of the most important military conclaves ever held in this country.

Moving pictures played a very important part in the proceedings. On the evening of October 7, the entire attendance of officers met in the gold room of the hotel and viewed about a mile and a half of film, the negative of which had been taken by Major Thomas J. Dickson, chaplain of the Sixth field artillery. The major has a national reputation among his brother officers as the "chaplain photographer," but his presentation of his instructive, technical military pictures proved that he was more than that, as he accompanied the pictured evolutions in the field by an admirable and entertaining lecture.

The opening "exercises" showed the national and international rifle and pistol competition at Camp Perry, Ohio, this year, with all its attendant incidents. An interesting series of views showed the experts shooting at moving targets—a moving deer among them. The closing scenes instructed the spectator on signal corps work. A call "To arms" was followed by the appearance of a company sent forward to meet the enemy. The men are seen in bivouac, with change of sentry at four in the morning. The waking of the cook, firemaking, breakfast and then the march follow in realistic order. Views of parade and guardmount, of camp scenes, of field exercises and of army life finished a program that was highly praised by the officers present.

Major Dickson is to be congratulated on the clear photography of the films. With more experience in this work, he will learn to avoid repetition of field movements, which tends to be tiresome.

Battle of Pine Ridge Made Realistic in Pictures.

During his stopover in Chicago, on his way to Pine Ridge, S. D., with his staff, where he will fight over again the battle of that name for the Buffalo Bill series of pictures, General Miles said about his trip:

"They want me there to make sure that everything they do is historically correct. I shall take active part in it, too, perhaps. The idea is to give the whole thing from the start—the Indian dissatisfaction, their starving condition, the coming of the false 'Messiah,' who stirred them to revolt; the massing of troops, the death of Sitting Bull and, finally, the surrender. All of these incidents will be gone over, just as they happened. Some of the Indians will be there who fought against us. They will fight again, but there will be no bullets. All that is over.

"I was asked to take charge of this campaign for the government. We expect this will be one of the finest records in the government archives. I understand nothing of the kind has ever been attempted before. Having these officers of my own staff there will make it a splendid thing. It will be a regular reunion on the ground where we fought and bled together."

The campaign in which the battle of Pine Ridge was fought was undertaken nearly twenty-five years ago.

Selig's New Building in London Near Completion.

William N. Selig, president of the Selig Polyscope Company, arrived home hale and tanned Saturday morning, October 11, after an absence of about nine weeks in Europe. Mr. Selig visited London, Paris, Hamburg, Berlin and Vienna on his business tour, and found the moving picture industry flourishing everywhere.

The new building of the Selig Polyscope Company on Wardour Street, in the heart of the film district, in London, will soon be finished. It is a handsome business structure, of four stories, and the premises will be devoted exclusively to the Selig product. E. H. Montagu, European representative, has planned for spacious offices, display rooms, a private theater, etc., all of which will conform to the strict regulations imposed by the London authorities. The building represents an outlay of $75,000.

Chicago Film Brevities.

A. Froebel, traveling representative of the St. Louis Motion Picture Company, paid a business trip to the city Friday and Saturday, October 10th and 11th. Mr. Froebel is booming Frontier films, which are advertising his company strongly. He returned to his home city Sunday evening, October 12th.

F. O. Nielson, owner of the Parkway Theater, North Clark Street and Diversey Boulevard, was presented with a handsome silver loving cup by his theater staff, on the celebration of his birthday, last week. The cup is mounted on a chaste ebony stand and the names of the donors are engraved on the cup. The Parkway is doing phenomenal business.

D. W. Martin, owner of the Butler Theater, 518 West 26th Street, visited the World office last week and renewed his subscription. He reports excellent business with programs furnished by the General Film Company. The Butler seats 300 people and charges five cents admission.

* * *

D. J. Worth, manager of the Maywood Theater, Maywood, Ill., called on us Tuesday, October 7th and renewed his subscription. Mr. Worth is very well pleased with his present business and he looks forward to a prosperous winter season. Mutual programs and singers are offered at the Maywood, which seats 670 people.

* * *

Thomas M. Sutherland, of Cedar Rapids, Ia., was a visitor at our office last week. Mr. Sutherland states that he is building a new moving picture theater with a seating capacity of about 650, which he expects will be in readiness for opening in about four weeks' time.

* * *

H. A. Jones, of Thomas & Jones, owners of the Colonial, Waukesha, Wis., stepped in to see us last week. The Colonial, formerly the old Opera House, which ran road attractions, is now offering the heaviest feature attractions. George Kleine's "Quo Vadis?" showed to capacity business recently at 25 and 50 cents. "The Battle of Gettysburg" was also presented a short time ago at 10, 20 and 30 cents, to fine business. While here, Mr. Jones contracted for George Kleine's "Last Days of Pompeii," which he ran Sunday, October 12th, at matinee and evening to overflowing business, at 25 and 50 cents.

Oscar Spindler, vice-president of the Decorators' Supply Company, Chicago, designed the decorations of the new Hotel Wisconsin, Milwaukee, which was opened October 8th. This magnificent 20-story structure is considered one of the finest hostelries in the Northwest.

William Foster, manager and principal director of the Foster Photoplay Company, a concern owned and operated solely by colored people, with offices and studio at 3312 Wabash Avenue, called at the World office recently. Mr. Foster prides himself on the fact that he uses no manuscript when directing his colored company, the members of which appear before the camera, in the back yard, at the address given. The scenarios are all written by colored authors. "The Railroad Porter," a one-reel farce comedy, in which Miss Lottie Grady, one of the foremost colored actresses of the present day, is featured, was finished some time ago and has been booked in various sections of the country. Mr. Foster states that this subject has been very successful wherever shown. In New York it appeared at the La Fayette Theater and in Chicago in the Grand, Phoenix and States theaters, all to fine business, so Mr. Foster says. There are 214 theaters in America owned and operated by colored men and Mr. Foster's product is used in all of them, he says. "The Fall Guy" and "The Butler," also farce comedies of a riproarious type, have just been released. "Ah don't want you to take mah word for it that these comedies are a big hit. Ah jus' want you to come an' see one of them an' laf yo head off," said Mr. Foster in most sincere and unaffected manner. From what I can learn, the Foster films thus far issued are laugh makers of a most infectious kind.

Residents of the Seventh Ward are protesting against the erection of a theater at East Fifty-third Street and Blackstone Avenue, within fifty feet of the Hyde Park Presbyterian Church. The Corporation Counsel advised the building commissioner that the city had no power to prevent the building from being erected; for, while the city ordinances prohibit the operation of a theater or other place of amusement within two hundred feet of a church, there is nothing in the municipal code which would warrant the refusal of a permit for the construction of a building intended to house a place of amusement.

"The Last Days of Pompeii"

A Six Part Production By Ambrosio to be Exhibited in America By George Kleine.

BARRING the fact that the Ambrosio company has not followed very faithfully the story of "The Last Days of Pompeii" as written by Bulwer Lytton, it is a very interesting and entertaining picture that has been made by that great Italian producer and is now being exhibited in America by George Kleine. Exceptionally beautiful are the settings of the various interior scenes and some magnificent effects have been produced in the exteriors. Rare photography characterizes the whole. It is shown in six parts.

Scene from "The Last Days of Pompeii" (Ambrosio).

For the purposes of this picture the producer has taken the story of the blind Greek girl, Nydia, and, with the characters, Glaucus, the Athenian; Arbaces, the Egyptian priest of Isis, and Ione, arranged an interesting plot which carries one logically along to the big scene portraying the eruption of Vesuvius and the destruction of Pompeii and Herculaneum. A beautiful scene has been constructed of the storm in the mountains which overtook Glaucus and Ione and forced them to seek refuge in the witch's cave. The cave scenes are also effective.

Scene from "The Last Days of Pompeii" (Ambrosio).

By the use of an ancient Roman arena and the employment of sufficient people to fill the seats within the field of the camera, a most realistic view of what might have happened on the occasion when Glaucus was compelled to fight the lions is given.

The scene of the eruption of Vesuvius and the efforts of the populace to escape the doomed city is startling in its conception and awful in its rendition. The general effect is such as to excuse some few minor defects, the cause for which is not apparent, but which do not seriously affect the illusion.

Adolph Zukor Returns From Abroad.

President of Famous Players Establishes Foreign Connections for His Company—Praise for His Productions.

Adolph Zukor, president of the Famous Players Film Company, returned on Friday last from a two-months' trip abroad. While away Mr. Zukor visited England, France, Germany, Austria and Hungary. Much of his time was spent in England, however. It was here that he organized an associate company for the manufacture of pictures on the same general plan pursued by the Famous Players in this country. There will be seven directors, four English and three American—Mr. Zukor, Mr. Frohman and Mr. Porter comprising the latter. For the sale of the product of the American company, offices were opened at 84 Charing Cross Road. S. M. Baber is the general manager. Up to the present time no production of the Famous Players has been placed on the foreign market, it having been the desire of Mr. Zukor and his associates to have everything on this side in complete working order before making any move abroad.

Mr. Zukor's trip was made principally for the purpose of showing film men on the other side what his company has been doing. He admits that the favorable reception of his pictures was, to express it mildly, a great surprise. When he exhibited Mrs. Fiske's "Tess of the D'Urbervilles" he found all gates opened. Anthony Hope, Thomas Hardy and Hall Caine, the authors, and Henry Arthur Jones, the playwright, came forward and offered the rights for their works. There was no delay in arranging terms satisfactory to all parties. Mr. Zukor said he had been prepared to hear varying opinions of the work of Mrs. Fiske, an American woman, in an English production, especially one so difficult of screen portrayal. The critics and buyers were unanimous in praise, however, and the latter were anxious to know how soon it would be put on the market.

The English organization of the Famous Players will have its own studio, arrangements for which are now under way. It is the intention to place it under American direction. The players will be English. The first production will be "The Silver King," a subject well known on both sides of the water. Some of the scenes will be taken in the West and others in England. This in itself will be a novelty, giving the picture an international interest. The foreign organization will, when the occasion requires, send its players over to the Continent. Those of the famous English actors who saw "Tess" were anxious to have their successes filmed in the same manner. Mr. Zukor says there will be no difficulty in securing all the stars the management of the new company may desire.

"THE GYPSY'S KISS" (Itala).

Seekers for the "punch" in the picture will find much pleasure in viewing a recent Itala release entitled "The Gypsy's Kiss." This picture, to all appearances, was staged upon some ancient Italian estate, and time worn architecture lends a charm to many of the scenes. The subject is in two parts and is a curious mixture of gypsy love and gypsy lore. A band of these nomads have camped upon the estate of the wealthy Count Paul. He visits the camp and meets the queen of the tribe, the beautiful Marinka, with whom he is at once fascinated. He asks for a rose she wears and is told that if he wants it he must come and get it and, quickly mounting a horse she leads him a merry chase through the forest. When the count finally overtakes her and is about to grasp the rose, Marinka bites him in the hand.

Incensed at this treatment Count Paul warns the gypsies that they will have to compel Marinka to apologize or all must leave his estate. This leads to a subsequent meeting between the count and Marinka at which the count attempts to make love to the gypsy queen and is fiercely repulsed. But the count takes his rebuff so kindly that he wins the girl's heart and she is about to grant his request when she recalls a prophecy that, whoever shall kiss her first shall die before sunset and her people shall be ruined; so she puts him off and manages to administer a narcotic that quickly puts him asleep, when she returns to her people.

While these events are happening at the count's castle, Baschir, Marinka's gypsy lover, observes Marinka and the count through a window and believes that Marinka has been kissed. The prophecy is recalled and Marinka is sentenced to be burned alive at the stake, Baschir winning the right to become executioner. Marinka is captured as she is leaving the castle and is hurried away to her death.

The count is awakened in the morning by a party of his friends with whom he is to go hunting. The events of the night before are as a dream, but as he is dressing for the hunt a commotion in the gypsy village, which can be seen from his window, attracts him and through a glass he sees Marinka bound to the stake and brutally kissed by Baschir, just before the jealous gypsy lover fires the pyre. Hastily mounting his horse, the count rides to the rescue and plucks Marinka from the flames. The gypsies are in flight and Baschir, destroying a bridge behind them, falls into the stream and is drowned—the victim of the prophecy, while the count, immune from the curse, receives the pledge of love from the gypsy queen.

"Doc" Willat Back From Europe.

Well-Known Film Man Visited Many Studios and Talked With Men of the Trade.

A. C. ("Doc") Willat is another returned European tourist. Mr. Willat while away visited many studios and met many moving picture men. In England he visited the Hepworth and London film studios. The plant of the latter is in a big structure at one time used as a skating rink and has a floor space of approximately 250 by 100 feet. Nearly all of the photographing in this building is done by artificial light, as the supply of the natural article is not dependable. In France Mr. Willat visited the Eclipse and Eclair studios and the Vitagraph factory. There is a new plant in this latter country which has been installed in a twenty-acre plot devoted for centuries to monatical uses. The factory proper is in the monastery. Mr. Willat described at length the other day to a World man the beautiful grounds and gardens which extend from the studio right to the River Seine, an ideal place for picture making. Mr. Willat noted in the gardens a sundial so old the metal was crumbling. Also he described with less enthusiasm a long underground passage terminating in a dungeon. The property will be devoted to the manufacture of features.

In Turin Mr. Willat visited Itala, Pasquali, Ambrosio and Savoia. The latter was described as not a large establishment, but as very artistic. The returned traveler is of the belief that the foreigners in spite of the fact that they are behind us in the matter of equipment are yet more successful in results by reason of the fact that they work more leisurely. Mr. Willat thinks the printing machines in this country are superior to the foreigners. One thing he said he would take up at once as a result of his observations, and that is to give more time to developing and printing. Mr. Willat said altogether he picked up much valuable information while away. Also he talked with many of the film agents so as to get an insight into the requirements of the European market. It is his intention when he begins manufacturing to so plan his product as to take advantage of the wonderful opportunities on the other side. Mr. Willat had expected to have a factory ready for operation by November 1st with a capacity of a million feet a week, but owing to some unforeseen happenings in Bayonne, N. J., he is just at present unsettled as to his plans. He says he is going to have a big factory very soon, however, as he has many contracts awaiting him.

GERMAIN'S FEATURE FILM SERVICE.

L. Germain reports that the response from exhibitors in the various States where he is offering Ambrosio's "The Betrothed" (especially the more critical and particular ones) is very satisfactory.

Through some error, the Moving Picture World did not include Pennsylvania among the States advertised which were secured by Mr. Germain for "The Betrothed." Exhibitors will therefore kindly note that his Eastern Pennsylvania office is located at 123 North Tenth Street, Philadelphia, Pa., and he is now arranging for a representation at Pittsburgh to care for Western Pennsylvania. The new six-reel thriller called "The Ghost Club" has already been secured by him for several States.

ALL STAR COMPANY SAILS FOR CUBA.

A company of players forming one branch of the All Star Feature Film Company sailed for Havana, October 11. The company is under the direction of Augustus Thomas and is making a special trip to take a moving picture version of Richard Harding Davis' "Soldiers of Fortune." The company's roster is as follows: George A. Stillwell, John Pratt, Ernest Laseby, Gus Piper Thomas, Leighton Stark, William Conklin, Sam Coit, William Winter Jefferson, John Saintpolis, Helen Luttrell, Winifred Kingston, Laline Brownell and Director William F. Haddock.

"The Prisoner in the Harem"

A Royal Bengal Tiger Helps the Hero in the Latest Four-Part Offering of the Blache Feature Film Company.

By H. C. Judson.

As producer and author of this picture, Herbert Blache deserves credit. It tells a four-part story of India and features the Countess de Marstini, a well known trainer of ferocious animals, who appears in the leading role as heroine and as the prisoner of the harem. Paul Bourgeois, who plays the hero's role, is also a trainer of wild animals and has, we understand, been associated with the countess in stage productions featuring tigers and lions before. The picture was made in America; but Mr. Blache shows rare skill in his weaving of Oriental atmosphere around the story. That scene before the gate of the rajah's castle and also the one showing the great audience chamber and the smaller scene in the rajah's harem are good; especially so is the chamber of audience, which is deep and wide and thoroughly Oriental. There is a fountain in the middle of it with a peacock disdainfully preening himself on its rim and the room apparently contains a fortune in rugs and hangings, with teak furniture knick-knacks in perfect keeping. The outdoor scenes are not tropical; but it must be remembered that in India one gets all kinds of climates, even frigid.

Countess de Marstini.

The opening scene introduces us to the two lovers (Countess de Marstini and Paul Bourgeois), simple people of India, and the former the daughter of a miser, played by Fraunie Fraunholz, a character that is drawn with imagination and finesse and is by all odds the best acted figure in the whole production; but that is not casting any slur on the other characters. Darwin Karr plays the rajah very well. It is not long before he appears in the picture, passing the home of the miser in his palanquin borne on the stout shoulders of black slaves. Unfortunately, he sees the beautiful Toru, daughter of the miser, and sends his chief official, a fierce muscular Indian, fit flunky for a villainous master, to buy her. It is only necessary to jingle a bag of gold in front of the miser to own the girl. The rajah has her carried away to his castle, where, in the harem, she is decked with gems and ornaments to await his pleasure. So, when poor Akbar, the lover, comes to the miser's house, he has to hear of the bargain. That night, wandering in the woods, he comes on a sick tiger, from whose paw he draws a thorn. This is the beast that is to play a wonderful part in the story, and now, in gratitude, it follows its benefactor home to become his willing slave.

Akbar has now learned where the girl is, and at night approaches the castle to free her. The tiger is with him and does good service keeping the guards away while the prisoner climbs down a rope ladder and, with her lover, makes her escape. But they are retaken and the tiger with them. The center of interest now is the cage in which Akbar is incarcerated with his pet in order that the beast, becoming hungry, may eat its master; but this doesn't happen and the irate rajah has lions introduced to do the job. But he still reckons without his host; for the tiger defends Akbar from the lions—there's a fight between two of the beasts and we are shown a dead lion, killed by the tiger. When he sees this, the rajah, filled with fury, draws his sword and enters the cage himself to slay Akbar. He is killed by the tiger and the prisoner escapes. The girl is now doomed to be burned on the pyre of her dead lord. This scene seems a bit unconvincing and weak. Akbar flies to the British officers and begs to have the atrocious thing stopped. The troops are put in motion; but the new rajah shows fight and there is a battle before the rescue.

It makes a good, interesting offering. The hero and heroine do very well considering the fact that their specialty is training wild animals—no actors could take their work or would have dared attempt it. The story holds interest well and has some sensational scenes.

"The Higher Courage"

A Two-Reel True Feature Release.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

This is a photoplay of fine motive and some thrilling situations that are wholly unforced. It portrays the humanity of a manly young gamekeeper, who is branded as a coward by an Alpine community when he refuses to fire upon poachers. Rather than kill or injure men engaged in hunting on his master's preserves, the young fellow allows them to escape, becomes an object of derison among them and is generally condemned by his associates. While smarting under the stigma, he discovers that a pet fawn belonging to his master's daughter has reached a point on a precipitous cliff where its condition is helpless.

The gamekeeper attempts to rescue the fawn and passes through some thrilling situations in his descent of the crumbling cliff. Whether or not his perils are real, they have that appearance—they give one a creepy feeling in the lower extremities—and even if he is supported by an invisible wire in his descent there is danger enough to satisfy those who watch a hazardous feat with tingling expectation of serious accident. The way he creeps from one foothold to another, where a slip or a loss of balance would mean injury if not death, presents an exciting spectacle.

He wins the admiration of one sweet girl, the proprietor's daughter, by saving the fawn, and enslaves another heart when he saves a girl tourist at even greater risk in much the same manner. He crowns these achievements by dragging his employer from a burning building in the full view of those who have mistaken his humanity for cowardice. The last exploit results in injuries which put the young game keeper in the interesting position of an invalid nursed by the proprietor's daughter and visited by girl tourist. He is now embarrassed with the attentions of two charming young women, a complete reversal of his situation, with the gratitude of his employer thrown in. He is extricated by his good sense, and the story ends happily.

Aside from the picturing of the hero's thrilling situations, his capable acting and fidelity of presentation in the matter of costume and background, there is a serious structural weakness in the story and a lack of characterization in the minor roles which should be avoided in the future. The story should have started with some portrayal of the hero's relations to the girl he eventually wins and some glimpse of his aspirations, so as to light up a flame of interest in what he is accomplishing. We do not know of any other motive in his exhibitions of courage than that of proving himself no coward until the story is well under way.

In a story of this kind, whose end is the winning of a girl, she should not appear as an unimportant character at the beginning, but be made a rival center of interest from the outset. It would almost appear that she was of minor consequence, a sort of afterthought, instead of a leading factor, the real inspiration of the young gamekeeper's heroism. There is also a lost opportunity in not proving that the gamekeeper's stand was an enlightened one by showing the results of shooting human beings for offenses so trivial. The producers, as in most cases, did not grasp the full value of the material they had in hand.

VITAGRAPH PLAYERS IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Seventeen members of the Vitagraph Company of America are among the mountains of North Carolina to produce mountain dramas. They are stopping at Esmeralda Inn, Bat-Cave, Hickery-Nut Gap, North Carolina. They will be in the Blue Ridge Mountains for five weeks, during which time they will act out three new dramas, each, a realistic portrayal of the life of the mountaineers. In the company are Director Ned Finley, Miss Edith Storey, Harry Northrup, James Morrison, Arthur Ashley, Jack Harvey, Cameraman Harry Keepers, Mrs. Storey, Mrs. Keepers, Miss Keepers, Logan Paul, Charles Cook, Frank Keppel, Temple Carr, Bobby Higgins, Frank Lestrange, and Property-man Herrman Hajenga. The three special feature dramas that will be portrayed in the mountains are "His Local Color," "Children of the Feud," and "Mid Kentucky Hills." The expense incurred will be considerable. The players will be away five weeks.

JAMES O'NEILL IN "MONTE CRISTO."

The next noted star to be presented in motion pictures will be James O'Neill, the eminent romantic actor, in the characterization he has interpreted for more than five thousand times on the stage, "The Count of Monte Cristo," to be released by the Famous' Players Film Company, in five reels, November 1st.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs

By George Blaisdell.

THERE has been issued by Stewart & Co., of New York, a volume of poems containing ninety-six pages and aptly entitled "Songs Toward the Sunlight." For of the sunlight surely are these songs touching many phases of life and all breathing of health, sweetness and light. The volume is inscribed "To My Mother"—just such a dedication as one would expect from a man who writes as does Hanford Chase Judson in the pages of this book. Mr. Judson is known to the readers of the Moving Picture World by reason of the special occasional articles he has written in the past three or four years. He may not be so well known as the continuous, conscientious writer of the bulk of the "Comments on the Films" during this period. "Songs Toward the Sunlight" gives us a new insight into the character of the man who has without exaggeration passed judgment on more than ten thousand films—ten million feet. That this task has not soured his outlook on life speaks well for the man and also perhaps for the pictures.

Let us quote just one section from Mr. Judson's "Ode on Beauty, the Awakener":

Under the sunlit, tropic clime,
In the deep hollows of the sea,
Dim and warm,
Where the even flow of time
Is not noticed, lives a swarm
Of wee builders, coral polyps, leaving silently
Cells as white as rime.
And still they build their marble homes
Over empty catacombs,
Until an island rises free;
Yet through the dim, untroubled hours
On their lives there comes no gleam
From the island; never dream
Visits them of light, of flowers,
Of palms majestic in their upward reach
Or long-winged combers curling on the beach.

Admirers of Frank Bushman and all lovers of good pictures should not miss Essanay's two-reel release of October 10th—"Dear Old Girl." Director Wharton has produced a splendid story. It pulls at the heartstrings all the way—at times perhaps uncomfortably hard. Yet nearly all of the first reel is gay; there is the light-hearted collegian going home to claim a bride; there is the girl awaiting him; the parents are decided in his favor in advance of the asking. The chums of the man are like other care-free young men, full of buoyant spirits and delighting in teasing the friend and companion. Somehow there is a feeling of impending tragedy; it is inescapable. That this is so is a tribute to the skill of the builder. When the bridegroom-to-be receives at the station the news that the bridal party has been destroyed in a wreck there is a shock, tempered perhaps by the feeling that bad news was coming. It seemed to the writer that the real "punch" comes when the shattered collegian again goes to the station accompanied by his friends. It is a situation of rare dramatic strength.

The acting of Mr. Bushman is exceptional. Miss Bayne in the short time she is on the screen will win hearts—and nowhere more certainly than in the town where the picture was taken; although it has been said that long before the Ithaca company returned to Chicago the composite heart of Cornell was at the feet of the young actress. William Bailey was splendid as the friend of the unfortunate collegian, and so were the two associates. It was a bold stroke on the part of Mr. Wharton to take a chance on Robert Walker, the colored servant. Mr. Walker's work added materially to the effectiveness, the reality, of the picture. The atmosphere of college life was finely sustained. The judicious flashes of the bells chiming out "Dear Old Girl" contributed to the illusion.

Inquest clubs in search of material for discussion on "Psychology of the Punch" will find it in abundance in this picture.

One of the chief advantages of picture work over that of the stage is the possession of a home and an opportunity to live in it with a certain amount of continuity. That this is not always the case, however, was illustrated in the calling of the roll of the Screen Club at the recent annual meeting. In two instances a little matter of seven thousand miles separated the men whose names were together. John Steppling was in San Francisco and Julius Stern in Berlin. Albert W. Hale was on the Pacific Coast and George Hall in Berlin.

E. Mason Hopper, who for nearly three years has been making Essanay comedies, dropped into town from Chicago last week. In less than two days Mr. Hopper had signed up with the Universal. He will make comedies.

Edwin August has tried his hand at making a military drama and with success. In "Through Barriers of Fire," released under the Bison 101 brand on October 18, there is a thrilling scene of an ammunition wagon being driven through burning brush and grass, the fire being spread by the Federals to prevent any Confederate wagons getting through. The experience must have been nearly as unpleasant for Mr. August as it certainly was for the mules. The combination is a sure-enough Missouri outfit, and they all "show 'em."

Billy Quirk, one of the old-timers on the screen, just to prove that he has not forgotten how to talk to an audience, will on November 1 make a tour of some of the Eastern and Middle Western States. He has several songs that have been written for him, and these, together with a talk and some dancing, ought to hold the picturegoers, and theatergoers, too.

D. H. Horsley is back in harness again at the Universal offices. His position is the same as when he left for his trip abroad—superintendent of laboratories. He intends to devote close attention to his company's photography, and to that end will closely examine the entire mechanical equipment. Mr. Horsley is qualified by experience and training for the duties of his place, and what is more he has a distinct liking for it.

"Jim" Hoff has received the following from the manager of the Universal's West Coast studios: "Jewish greetings to you and entire Moving Picture World staff. Bernstein." Make no mistake, the good wishes are heartily reciprocated.

Director Edwin S. Porter, of the Famous Players, the other day showed the writer over his company's new laboratory. It is situated on the floor below the studio and is so arranged that the various rooms are all together in the form of a square. The equipment is up to the minute and there is every appliance for fast and accurate work.

The city authorities of Grand Rapids, Mich., are standing back of their local ordinances regulating the projection of moving pictures and deny the jurisdiction of the inspectors from the state fire marshal's offices who recently have been closing picture theaters and ordering removed from churches and schools moving picture apparatus. The claim is made that the school authorities will continue to install portable booths, with every precaution for safety, and that, as they are to be used for educational and not amusement purposes, the action of the city officials is not reviewable by the state inspectors. So far as concerns the amusement houses proper, the local people say that the city laws are superior to those of the state, and that, in the event of the theater men seeking to restrain by injunction the state inspectors, the entire legal machinery of the city will be placed at their disposal.

Agitation over the making of films more or less related to the misadventures of an escaped lunatic is said to be responsible for the action of the Detroit police authorities compelling a showing of all pictures at police headquarters before exhibition, and assessing a tax of 75 cents on every thousand feet of film so censored. Much might be written in comment on the foregoing, but the facts seem to speak for themselves.

Albert Blinkhorn received on Tuesday the first of the Florence Turner films to be made in England. The picture is in two reels and is entitled "Rose of Surrey." There was lively bidding for it on the part of prospective buyers. The next Turner picture will be "Jean's Evidence," in which the famous collie will be featured. It also is in two reels. Another production which arrived on Tuesday in Mr. Blinkhorn's bag is "The Kissing Cup," a four-reel Hepworth, which is said to be a fine picture. Mr. Blinkhorn has disposed of the New York City and State rights for "David Copperfield" to the Theater Film Company. Mr. Blinkhorn, by the way, is getting out an elaborate Copperfield booklet.

On Monday, October 20, Loew's Herald Square Theater will begin a five-reel, first-run service. This will be good news to those who like to follow new pictures. Manager Rothschild is pleased at the idea. He says he is tired of hearing patrons say of a second run: "Why, I saw that picture yesterday." The Square has been using three firsts and two seconds. Mr. Rothschild is now charging 15 cents for the entire house in the evening and is having no trouble in filling his theater.

With Essanay at Ithaca.

A Delightful Sojourn Among the Classic Shades of Cornell University with a Congenial Company of Photoplayers.

By Hugh Hoffman.

IT was a lucky chance that took Theodore Wharton to Ithaca, N. Y., last fall to produce a football picture for Essanay. He made the picture and returned to Chicago with a sworn determination to visit Ithaca once more at the head of a company of Essanay players and there make pictures to his heart's content in one of Dame Nature's prodigal little oases of scenic beauty. There was little use of George K. Spoor denying Theodore his wish, so he issued a requisition for one complete company of nineteen to be shipped to Ithaca in late May last, or early June, I don't remember which.

In the waning August I "hopped a rattler" (slang for boarding a train), bound for Ithaca and wished myself into the charmed circle for the space of a couple of weeks, with no other motive than passing the time pleasantly, which I did, although more strenuously than I had anticipated. It was evident, immediately, that the keys of the city had been handed to the Essanay people on a silver platter, and they, being the right sort of people, knew how to accept this courtesy without abusing it. This is mentioned in particular because there have been acting companies elsewhere that have returned such courtesies in a negative way.

I had expected to find the company living the usual hotel life, but was given a mild surprise to find them domiciled in some of the finest residences in the most exclusive section of the town, and all settled down and quiet, like regular citizens of that classic burg. Usually there is nothing funnier than a bunch of actor folks keeping house. The thought brings back recollections of an admiring circle of men observing a smaller circle of perspiring women around a hot stove, collaborating on a cook-book pudding; likewise an admiring circle of women surrounding an earnest group of squatting men doctoring a chicken for the "pipp." But movie actors are reformed actors. By stationary occupation they become used to home life and soon take on the ways of home folks. This accounts for the domesticated state in which the Essanay people were found, living on Cornell Heights in the homes of college professors, who usually spend the summers elsewhere. It augurs well for the standing of motion picture people when they are received into the best homes of an aristocratic city and are welcomed into the social life of the place.

The Essanay headquarters were located at the residence of Judge Paul K. Clymer, the eminent lecturer on political science. Here also lived that prince of leading men, Francis X. Bushman, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Wharton and dog, "Buster." On the wide lawn just beside the house an open air stage of good size had been erected, and there the company assembled each morning, either to do interiors upon the stage or to start upon a cross country journey. The upper floor of the Clymer residence was devoted to dressing rooms, and the carpenters and scenic artists worked in a temporary structure behind the house. The roaring of the waters in the canyon behind the house could be heard at all times. Beyond this gorge the classic buildings of Cornell University loomed majestically through the trees. Five minutes walk across a hanging bridge would bring you out upon the splendid campus. From every point of view the natural grandeur of the country disclosed virgin backgrounds for the motion picture camera for years and years to come.

Almost any scene necessary to a motion picture can be found at Ithaca. The town itself can supply all the city scenes that may be required, but in addition to this are numerous rocky ravines with perpendicular walls and countless waterfalls. Cayuga Lake just at hand is there with twenty miles of water scenes. The great temples of Cornell University are available when imposing edifices are required. Beautiful walks and roads supply the demand for romantic settings, and yet a few steps take one into the wildness of the forest primeval. A hundred magnificent distances were to be had at any time merely by turning the camera on its pivot.

It was amid scenes of this description that such splendid pictures as, for instance, Essanay's late release "Dear Old Girl," were taken. A long list of summer features was taken at Ithaca, notable among which are: "Sunlight," "For Old Time's Sake," "Tony the Fiddler," and "Dear Old Girl," produced by Theodore Wharton; and "The Whip Hand," "The Right of Way," "The Love Lute of Romany," produced by Archer McMackin.

The open air stage was the gathering place not only of the photoplayers, but a general rendezvous for Ithacans who could spare the time and for many who could not. To the summer students it was a powerful magnet which no doubt caused the burning of much midnight oil to make up the time. During the taking of one scene there I counted as many as 250 college boys reclining upon the lawn. And what a fine set of boys they were. There was nothing within their power that they would not do to help the Essanay Company in its work. They donated their fraternity houses, they carried their furniture to and from the studio, they used their influence to get props from the Museum of Natural History and worked in the scenes as though the very honor of their alma mater depended upon it.

Nor was this good spirit confined to the college boys. The townspeople gathered there and the college faculty as well. Their personal property was always at the disposal of the company and they held themselves in readiness to appear at any time. Thus it happens that in most of Essanay's Ithaca pictures some prominent citizen or college professor or popular college student appears.

When evening came and work was done, these good people further showed their hospitality by inviting the Essanay people to their dances and other social affairs, for all of which they have asked me to publicly thank the people of Ithaca and to say that they look for no greater pleasure than to be among them again, to remain for a much longer time.

THEODORE WHARTON'S BIG JOB.

The executive brains of the big Essanay production of the "Life of Buffalo Bill," at Pine Ridge, South Dakota, are mainly under the hat of Theodore Wharton. To him has been entrusted the enormous undertaking of handling several thousand troops and Indians, and as many horses, to say nothing of handling the Colonel himself, who is said to have all the ways of a prima donna. Several other producers have attempted to film the life of B. B., but with indifferent results, mainly on this account. Therefore, if Theodore gets away with it, which he undoubtedly will, he will earn further glory for himself as a top notch producer. It is estimated that this production will cost $100,000, the magnitude of which is described in a letter from Mr. Wharton, that has come lately to this office, as follows:

"I am in the Bad Lands of South Dakota, hemmed in on one side by the U. S. Army and on the other by the Sioux Nation. I will have to fight my way out, or in other words, reproduce the last Indian Wars, historically correct. I will be assisted in this by Buffalo Bill, Generals Miles, Baldwin, Mans, King, Col. Sickles, and all surviving officers of those wars, as well as hundreds of troops and Indians, also all surviving Scouts and Indians. A more wonderful sight you cannot imagine. As I look from my tent I see hundreds of teepees stretched over the hills on one hand, and the camps of soldiers on the other. To give you an idea of the magnitude of the production, I will say that we are using more than 1000 horses in the production, and this is not a press agent's estimate either.

"Some job for little Willie, eh? It will either make or break yours truly. My one regret is that I will be unable to see the Moving Picture World for several months. It is like losing my best friend."

PICTURES HIGHLY EDUCATIONAL.

Following an investigation of Cincinnati's recreation spots, Miss Helen S. Trounstine, Secretary of the Juvenile Protective Association, in a report delivered on October 1, declared "The defects in the motion picture theater buildings noted in previous years were found to have been remedied. Although the ventilation in a number of respects could still be improved, it is vastly better than formerly, and the places are safe in case of fire or accident. We also find that there are very few objectionable films, most of them being highly educational."

JEWISH PICTURE THEATER.

The Ohio-West Virginia Realty Company, on Saturday, September 27, let the contract for the building of the Ohio Theater at the northeast corner of Fifteenth Street and Central Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio. The theater to cost about $60,000 exclusive of the land, will be of the motion picture type, but will serve a new purpose in that field, since its owners intend to bring to Cincinnati, Jewish plays. The site of the improvement is in the heart of Cincinnati's Ghetto, and it is planned to make the theater a sort of Jewish social center, in conjunction with the Jewish Settlement, located in the same neighborhood. The house will have 1,000 seats.

The Eclair Happy Family—Photo Taken Near Fort Lee Studio.

The name of the "Family" as they stand in the group from left to right are Clara Horton, the famous "Eclair Kid"; Miss Helen Marten, who does so many Indian girl parts; Miss Millie Bright, who has recently played a number of leads and has been christened "The Diving Venus"; Miss Julia Stuart, the "mother" of all and an exceptionally clever character woman; Miss Barbara Tennant, the beautiful leading woman of so many Eclair features; Robert Frazer, the handsome juvenile lead, Alec B. Francis, the versatile Englishman who has a host of admirers everywhere; Fred C. Truesdell, who has earned the sobriquet of "President Wilson's double," since his work in "Sons of a Soldier," and Will Sheerer, Eclair's remarkable character man. J. W. (Big Jack) Johnson (in the corner) is today one of the most popular men in pictures. He has a face of wonderful power and his work has placed him in the very first rank of picture stars.

PARIS LETTER.

(Special Correspondence to the WORLD.)

ON Wednesday, September 24th, the Eclair Company gave, at the Folies Bergere Music Hall, a "repetition generale" of a cinematographic sketch entitled "Pour gagner le million" (To win the million). The play—which lasted over an hour—was a mixture of moving pictures and musical farce introducing on the screen and in the flesh, the leading Eclair comedians. A newspaper had offered a million francs to the first person bringing a copy of the paper, which had been placed in a specified part of the globe, to the editorial offices, hence the title and around this plot was woven a fantastic story of adventure, shown to the public by screen and stage pictures. The animated pictures included a most thrilling automobile accident which was warmly applauded. The whole show was very favorably received. Many well known people were in the house to see "Pour gagner le million" and among them I noticed Bannel of the Folies Bergere—who appeared to like the production—Marinelli's manager and R. A. Reader, of the Vitagraph Company.

* * *

R. A. Reader, who has charge of the Vitagraph branch here, has just come back from a couple of months sojourn on your side of the Atlantic. He is looking as hearty as ever and tells me he had a fine time in the States. Mr. Reader is anxiously awaiting the completion of the Vitagraph Co.'s new studios. Vitagraph films are perhaps the most popular American photoplays in France; Bunny and Costello are great favorites with Parisians. By the time this is in print, the big Vitagraph wild animal film "Wild Beasts at Large," will have been exhibited for a week as a star attraction at the Gaumont Palace Hippodrome.

The Gaumont Palace Hippodrome is said to be the largest picture theater in the world. It has seating accommodation for six thousand five hundred persons and plays to capacity business seven nights a week. Prices of admission are from ten cents upwards and all classes of people visit the place, including, of course, hundreds of foreigners, with a large sprinkling of Americans and English. In this vast picturedrome one is able to get a clear idea of what is wanted in picture plays by the French public and on that account all readers of this paper who chance to be in Paris should not miss going up to the Place Clichy. This week, Gaumonts are screening, as an exclusive, Ambrosio's "Last Days of Pompeii." In taking in one day, space in the Matin equivalent to more than half a page, Gaumonts did the largest piece of press advertising that has yet been done here in connection with picture shows.

* * *

The moving picture version of the successful play "L'homme qui Assissina" (The Man Who Assassinated), has met with success. It is the work of "Les Grands Films Populaires" and was played by the original Theater Antoine cast including Gemier, the celebrated actor. The film is in two parts, takes about fifty minutes to run through and is finely colored. The acting and mise-en-scene are excellent.

* * *

The General Film Agency, of London and Paris, are introducing to France the Kesnor ticket issuing machine. Heretofore paper tickets have been in use in almost all picture theaters, but with the advent of the Kesnor, the strips should rapidly give place to the metal checks.

* * *

Under the name of "X Film" a new producing firm has commenced operations.

Jacques Munoz, owner of the French rights of the Paul Rainey Hunt pictures, intends to present a series of exclusive features during the forthcoming season at the Casino de Paris. The Casino is the hardest proposition to work in Paris. Since its first day of opening as a skating rink, it has never known complete success. Two years ago the American manager, Brockway turned the place into a picture show and did some big business with "Dante's Inferno," then he sold the place to E. V. Barton the present director.

* * *

Mr. Paul Burgi, I am informed, has been appointed sole agent for Powers picture plays.

* * *

Rushing down to Epinay sur Seine one afternoon, I found indications of great activity at Joseph Menchen's lovely moving picture park. First releases of productions of the Societé des Films Menchen will be made very shortly. They include "Arsene Lupin," produced under the supervision of the author, Maurice Leblanc. Mr. Menchen is sparing no money on the films.

The Lubin productions are now being handled here by the Mondial Film Company of 24 rue Richer.

* * *

R. A. Sprecher gave a special private exhibition of the great Biograph picture "The Battle of Elderbush Gulch." Sprecher is the young and energetic representative of the M. P. Sales Agency.

* * *

The Savoia feature "In Hoc Signo Vinces," has been purchased by a new firm—The Central Film Service.

Charles Helfer is booming Selig's "Alone in the Jungle." Selig's recent release "Wamba," was shown at many Paris picture theaters.

The Film Color Ulysse of Paris, London, Windsor and Tokio, announce the issue of two films entitled "Tuileries and Potteries" and "A Bull Fight." No public exhibition of this new process has yet been given here. At a private show, held under the direction of Edward Laurillard, of London, at the American Biograph, the pictures appeared to me to be satisfactory reproductions in color.

* * *

The International Star Film, controlled by Messrs. d'Ugente Freres, of Nice, have a batch of subjects ready for delivery. The firm is anxious to fix up agencies abroad.

Edmond Bretel, director of the "Cosmograph" Co., has engaged Monsieur Brunot, of the Comedie Française theater, to play in a series of comedies.

* * *

Juan Sala is releasing, on October 13th, the first production of the Copenhagen Film Co., Ltd. It is a detective drama entitled "Gorki." Sala is a newcomer in the ranks of agents.

"The Escapade" is the title of the next Film d'Art feature.

At the time of writing the directors of the Lux Co. have not decided whether they will continue to carry on business with increased capital, or wind up the company.

* * *

It is rumored that Georges Feydeau's story "Le Dindon," has been done in moving pictures.

The Express Film Agency have secured the French rights for the B. & C. (of London), feature "The Battle of Waterloo."

* * *

Another new firm which has just commenced business is the Societé Cinematographique Plaissetty & Cie. They are agents for Filma picture plays. Offices located at 6 rue Daunou.

The event of the month is the issue of Pathe's S. C. A. G. L. masterpiece "Germinal."

The celebrated French comedy "Florette et Patapon" has been filmed by the Gloria Company. Paul Ladewig markets these pictures.

Eclairs are now installed in their fine new offices in the rue Gaillon, a couple of minutes walk from the Place de l'Opera. Eclair films can only be rented from the company and the Agence Generale. The firm has, perhaps, forged more rapidly ahead than any other in Europe. The Eclair Journal is an established success. The company has extensive studios and factories out at Epinay sur Seine where films, including colored pictures, are made from beginning to end. Messrs. Eclair are, I understand, shortly putting on the market an exceedingly compact and simple camera which at the present time is used by them for photographing Eclair films.

Pegoud, the daring aviator and originator of looping the loop in an aeroplane, was engaged at the Folies Bergere music hall. With a model Bleriot machine and Pathé film records of his flight, he explained to the audience how he flies upside down. The turn was a great success.

JOHN CHER.

BRITISH NOTES.

(Special Correspondence to the WORLD.)

MISS MARIE CORELLI, the celebrated novelist, has for the time being forsaken literary work for moving picture scenarios. She has decided to present her first effort to the distinguished artist-producer, Sir H. Herkomer, who himself appears in the film. Sir Hubert says that it is the simplest of love tales and in its delineation Miss Corelli has proved herself to be almost a dramatic futurist. It is absolutely free from sensationalism and she is with us in our endeavor to free the picture play of the future from the sensational monstrosities which mar it to-day. "Miss Corelli is quick to see," continued the artist, "that incident is essential and if they are intelligently filmed they are more telling dramatically than the freak incidents insisted upon by most film producers."

* * *

The London Film Company has produced its first subject with much eclat and beating of drums. This is entitled "The House of Temperley," being an adaptation of the popular novel embodying the story. So far as I have been able to ascertain no American agents have yet been appointed. The trade mark of the film is a Royal beefeater stood erect with spear in hand. Studios have been secured on the outskirts of London and the company is closely allied with the Provincial Cinematograph Theaters, Ltd., who control some of the most elaborate shows in Europe.

* * *

The Kalem Company's "From Manger to Cross," which has successfully weathered the storm of criticism from the clergy, is being re-booked rapidly as a Christmas attraction here.

* * *

The noted American detective, W. H. Pinkerton, has been giving his views on everything and everybody to the reporters. "I am a great believer in moving pictures as an educational force," he says, "but I do not believe in highway robberies and murders on the film." He was much surprised to hear that it is a common thing to find the program of English picture shows composed scarcely of anything else.

* * *

Mr. S. Higham, of Birkdale, Southport, has invented a system of color photography for which a patent is being sought. A screen is used bearing three or more colored filters, of which one is red. These filters are so arranged that every alternate exposure or projection is made through the red filter. The Thornton-Pickard Manufacturing Company are also seeking a patent for a new projector shutter to be fixed between the condenser and the film instead of in front of the lens as in most machines.

* * *

American producers, especially those associated with the house of Edison, will probably be surprised to hear that Mr. Harry Furniss, the cartoonist who undertook considerable productive work last year for the Edison Co., has started film producing on his own account on the South Coast of England. The unqualified success in this country alone of the plays revolving around his adventures as an artist has been the main factor in influencing Mr. Furniss to enter the manufacturing business.

* * *

The Cines Co., of Rome, on October 2nd, offered, in London, by auction, the British rights of their "Antony and Cleopatra" films, a historic symposium very much along the lines of their recent success "Quo Vadis." Bidding started at £4,000 and rose five hundred pounds at a time until it reached the record figure of £8,500 ($43,000), at which it became the exclusive property of Messrs. Ruffells, of London. Quite a congregation of trade representatives attended the sale, including not a few Americans. Messrs. Ruffells' rights hold good for three years. The purchasers of this film have also secured as an exclusive feature one of the best productions of the Bison 101 Co., which they are advertising in a decidedly novel fashion. They have arranged with the editor of "Tit Bits," a weekly journal of extensive circulation, to offer a prize of £100 for the best title for this subject. Messrs. Ruffells will also give another £100 to the picture theater at which the successful competitor witnesses the film.

Although not strictly within the province of "British Notes," it may interest the American trade to know that Sigurd Ibsen, son of the celebrated Henrick Ibsen, the playwright and moralist, is arranging to produce "Peer Gynt," "The Festival of Solhang," and other of his father's most notable plays. The contract for production, extending five years or more, has been let to a well-known Norwegian firm and a stipulated condition is that the players are to be Norwegians.

* * *

It is now the custom rather than the exception when a film of unusual dramatic, historic or literary importance is released in this country for the manufacturers to arrange with some of the well known London publishers for the issue of a series of properly bound books of the story. I have noticed on the railway bookstalls this week an artistically prepared volume describing the story of "A Message from Mars" as portrayed by the film. The ultimate result cannot be other than a splendid advertisement for the picture. Another novelty in the advertising line has recently been noticed in the vicinity of the Strand. A gentleman with a broad display of shirt-front has been spending the most of his time parading the streets in evening attire. Suddenly there flashes across his expanse in illuminated letters "What Happened to Mary," Go and See at the ——— Theater.

* * *

The new United States Tariff reductions might possibly give a weighty impetus to British film and photographic exports. The new tariff entirely removes the duty of 1½ cents per foot upon sensitized films. But they have not to be either exposed or developed. How are the custom authorities going to tell which films are exposed and which are not?

* * *

American scenario editors must be wary when accepting scripts from certain writers in this country. Particulars have just reached me of the acceptance by a New York firm of a manuscript which when produced turned out to be one of J. M. Barrie's plays. These being already copyrighted in the U. S. A., the result was somewhat embarrassing.

* * *

This week's list of notables who have decided to appear on the film includes Sir Geo. Alexander in "John Chilcote M. P.," and "Much Ado About Nothing"; Mr. Matheson Lang, Mr. Herbert Waring in Weyman's "Under the Red Robe," and Miss Evelyn Millard in "Lady Ursula's Adventures."

* * *

Three French inventors are applying for a British patent for an apparatus consisting of an electric motor provided with a braked pulley operating a phonograph directly and a cinematograph machine through synchronizing mechanism comprising a friction disc change-speed gear and a flexible shaft whereby the phonograph may be rotated at its normal and constant speed and the cinematograph synchronized therewith. Another and perhaps more interesting invention is that of Mr. J. E. Mallinson, of Fenchnoch St., London, for the production of a stereoscopic image. The picture is projected upon a screen which is invisible to the spectators who view its reflection in a mirror suspended at an oblique angle. The mirror is of plate-glass so that there is a direct reflection of the picture as well as a subsidiary reflection occuring after internal reflection within the glass itself. The subsidiary reflection is not exactly superimposed upon the direct reflection, so thereby produces a stereoscopic effect. The picture on the screen (invisible to the spectators), is transmitted to the mirror through one or more magnifying lenses fixed in the end of a box or chamber opposite the screen. The spectators view the reflection upon a piece of ordinary glass facing them.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

The Country Store.

SOMEWHAT belated comes a request for information as to what the Country Store is. The country store is a souvenir scheme that takes its name from the fact that it is a distribution of groceries in the guise of souvenirs. As it is generally worked certain stores contribute specified articles or at least enable the management to purchase goods at cost price in return for whatever advertising is conveyed by the use of the firm's name in the distribution.

With each ticket a card is delivered and this must be filled in with the name and address of the recipient. At the end of the performance certain persons are called to the stage to receive the gifts. If the management is clever many of these gifts are so ridiculously out of keeping that the laughter helps along the situation. A clever man at the gate, knowing the prizes, will note on the cards the likely members of the audience. A young man may be called to the stage to receive two packages of baby food to the great distress of the young woman who accompanies him and a wholly bald-headed man may be given two bottles of hair restorer "from Blank's prescription pharmacy." The selection of names in this manner is held by lawyers not to constitute a lottery, since the distribution does not depend upon chance.

The value of the scheme lies in the comedy that is created by the selection of recipients and the clever "patter" of the person making the distribution. It is not customary to announce the prize until the victim is already on the stage, and it is safest to have a second and even a third name for each prize as insurance against "cold feet."

Meeting All Comers.

There may be two opinions as to the value of the scheme of the Olympian Theater, Seattle, but the idea seems sound enough for a large town where more than one theaterful can be appealed to. Here is the clipping from the Olympian News

> PLEASING EVERYBODY
> It is the desire of the Olympian management to please everybody. This object cannot be accomplished by having the same kind of program every night, therefore variety seems to be the solution of the problem.
>
> There are four kinds of entertainment the Olympian can offer pictures, vaudeville, solos, and the music of pipe organ and piano. These the Olympian will hereafter offer, as long as our guests seem to like them, and they will be given in such manner that they may be taken as wanted, that is, certain evenings will be devoted to certain kinds of entertainment. For instance, do you like vocal solos? No? Then come Monday, Tuesday, or Saturday, for there will be none those evenings, but instead there will be pictures with accompanying pipe organ or piano music, of course. Do you like a little clean vaudeville once in a while? Drop in Wednesday evening and enjoy a couple of acts. They won't be Orpheum headliners, to be sure, but they'll usually be pretty fair. Perhaps you don't care for professional talent and would prefer the actors in the making. Come in Friday evenings. Would you be interested in a reproduction of important events in our own vicinity? Monday evening's Olympian Pictorial News will please you then. For those who like good vocal music, occasionally varied by instrumental, Sunday and Tuesday evenings have been set apart.
> Take it altogether the Olympian offers about everything to entertain excepting the Shakespeare, Bernard Shaw and George Cohan type of stuff, and really they are out of date.
> No matter what special entertainment is provided the regular photoplay program will always be given.

Most persons do not care for the sort of vaudeville that the picture theater can afford. Some do. The Olympian caters to both classes and is honest enough to admit that it is the picture sort of vaudeville. Almost any taste may be catered to on one or more evenings of each week and you can tell in advance just what you are going to get. This is possible only in the larger towns where the house can draw from a large population, and even then it may be argued that it is best to cater always to those who like pictures properly played, but this special night's idea is novel and may give a hint to other readers of this page.

Waving the Flag.

A correspondent wants to know what we think of playing the National Anthem. The question is obscurely put, but we gather that nightly the American flag is thrown on the screen and The Star Spangled Banner played. One man who writes pieces to the paper complains that it is getting to be a nuisance.

In England practically every performance terminates with the playing of God Save the King, and all uncover as they hurry from the house. It is an admirable custom, but God Save the King is shorter than the nearest approach we have to a national anthem, and it comes at the very end of the performance, when the audience is on its feet, anyhow.

During the Spanish-American War we had to cover seven vaudeville shows a week and for months there was not a night that we did not have to bob up on our feet from one to three times. It was not patriotism, but what actors knows as "Give-me-your-kind-applause stuff," and a great deal depends upon whether or not the anthem is played in a spirit of patriotism or for the sake of the applause. In the United States it is not the custom to play the anthem generally, and while we approve the idea as an idea, in practice it is too apt to be regarded as a cheap appeal to cheap sentiment rather than a spontaneous manifestation of patriotism.

One of the few houses we know that regularly plays the audience out with The Star Spangled Banner is Miner's Bowery Theater, New York, where the house leader, Carl Williams, brought the custom down from the old London when that house closed. Here it is not an appeal to sentiment, but, as Mr. Williams explains, a sign that the show is over.

"You never can tell when something will happen," he explained once. "I get the people used to going home when I play the Star Spangled Banner. If it is necessary to get them out in a hurry the boys play that and out the house goes."

For a time, some years ago, he used a march, but popular marches grow old and the national song goes on forever. The Williams theory has never been put to the test, but we think the idea a good one and should like to see it generally adopted.

In passing, the correspendent is advised that Edison's "The Great Physician" is an allegory and not melodrama.

Stencils.

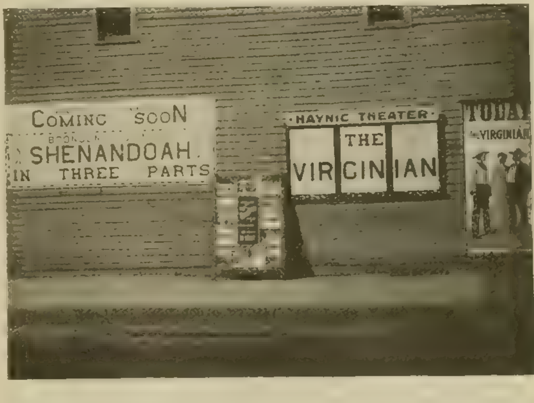
Somehow we just get done thanking Hay and Nicholas for something when they go and do something else. This time it's stencils. It will be remembered that they asked this department some time ago for large stencils for lettering banners that could be had for a reasonable price. We dug up two names and they ordered some from H. de Subers and promised to report. Here is a photograph of some of their work with these stencils, and their comment on the matter after they have given the stencils a trial.



> Some little time ago we promised you a report of the stencils which we were procuring from Mr. H. de Subers. We think the inclosed photo of some of our first work will be the best report we can make. This is our uptown display. We rent this space by the year. The building is old and dilapidated, but it is the most prominent corner in the town and we find it good advertising.
> The day this photo was taken we were not running pictures. We had a "road show" in the house, but we did not want our poster frames to lie idle so we painted the sign shown in the frames on plain white paper. This paper we get from a lithographing house; it is regulation one-sheet size, 28 x 42, and it is inexpensive. If any of the brothers contemplate trying the stencil work, they would better lay in a supply of this paper for they will find it useful in making posters for special occasions.
> For the benefit of other exhibitors we are glad to say that we found Mr. de Subers very fair in his dealings with us, and that his prices are very reasonable.

With several sets of stencils a large sign can be quickly lettered that will look like real advertising and not like the home made effort of the usher or the ever-useful operator. We do not know how close together Fairmount and Glenwood are, but if they are in the same half of Michigan Bert Williams should get over to see the Haynic.

Work With the Town.

Kalina and Sergel, of the Rex theater, Buhl, Idaho, have been trying a number of schemes of late including the "Raffles" stunt, in which some unknown person was designated Mr. Rex and the rest of the town had to pick him out. Ten dollars was to be paid to the first person who approached Mr. Rex with a coupon given out at the last performance at the Rex and this formula:

> "Pardon me, but you are the Mysterious Mr. Rex of the Rex Theater, where everybody goes? The Gold is mine."

As soon as the Tuesday performance opened the Monday coupon was void. The advertising value of the scheme lies in the fact that hundreds of persons will be approached and the name of the Rex will be introduced to those few who have not heard it. Here are some other schemes:

> Following as nearly as possible your valued suggestions, we have made some changes in the make-up of our "Rex News" and inclose copies of our last two issues.
> This publication, crude as it is, does us a great deal of good. We have a big mailing list, 70 per cent. of which is rural.
>
> Scan these publications closely and make suggestions for their improvement. We appreciate your department and have gained many good ideas from it.
> We opened our house with a benefit under the auspices of the Civic Club, on the 50-50 basis. Proceeds for the City Park Fund. We were gratified at receiving the following letter from the club shortly after mailing them our check for their share of the receipts.
>
> "At a recent meeting of the Civic Club I was authorized to extend the management of the new Rex theater our formal thanks for the benefit of the opening nights of your splendid theater.
>
> "We very much appreciated the courtesy extended us and shall be very glad at any time to do all we can to uphold the policy you have inaugurated in giving to the public clean, wholesome entertainment."
>
> If you care to use this as an example of the fact that it pays the exhibitor to "be one of the people" you may do so, only we prefer that you do not mention our house or firm name in connection with it.
>
> On top of this, we have the local Commercial Club back of us. Secured the "Fly Pest" and ran it free. The Commercial Club was so impressed with the subject that they printed bills—copy inclosed—and distributed them at their own expense.
>
> We want to report favorably on the "Mysterious Raffles" stunt. We have just closed the "Mysterious Mr. Rex" hunt and it proved a big success for a small town.
>
> The writer is not looking for free publicity nor seeking glory in sending in these reports to your department, and if there is nothing meritorious in what we send we don't want anything published and our feelings will not be hurt. We are merely trying to contribute our mite.
>
> In closing, I want to inform you that BUHL is pronounced Buel and not Bull, so that perhaps, after all, Barnum and Buhl are not quite so an appropriate combination as one would think.

The Rex News shows improved form, but we think that some of the white space on the program page could be taken up by larger type for the titles. The appearance of that page is too casual. It does not impress, and yet this is the really important page of the four.

It is good management when a house can get the indorsement of the local societies, but we have told before how the Rex management works with the other workers for the good of the town.

Good For the House.

This letter from R. J. Relf, who manages the Princess Theater, Decorah, Iowa, shows the proper spirit:

> Inclosed find photo of the Princess Theater. This is a town of less than 4,000 and three houses. Picture the many warm battles we have. The Princess shows the Universal program and I have just contracted for the exclusive service of the Famous Players. Although we only seat about 200, I feel that nothing is too good for my patrons, and although I can't make any money on these big features, they are a good ad for the house.
> I agree with you there are too many gun play and saloon scenes. We need more educational and travel stuff and less of the blood and thunder stuff. Keep at the makers until they hear and pay attention.

Not many theaters with a two hundred capacity would tackle the Famous Players content with an even break or a loss on the grounds that it will be good for the house in the long run, but Mr. Relf sends a photograph of the house billed for "The Prisoner of Zenda." The Princess is not an imposing appearing house, but a man who runs his house in that spirit will not always have a two hundred house in a four thousand town. He's bound to grow.

Ben Zerr's Ideas.

There is something about Ben Zerr that makes us glad to see him come down from Reading even when he brings us no pretzels in a barrel—ever get one of those "cream puffs"? He doesn't have to pay for a welcome with a pretzel, he just breezes in and we all stop work to say "Howdy." The reason for it is that he is in the photoplay business for life and his son's life after him, and may they both be long in the land. He runs his Schuylkill Theater along those lines and the spirit shines out on his business cards, which read "Cinematography, the greatest factor of the day." The last time he came to town he brought with him a photograph of one of his matinee audiences, with the boys on one side and the girls on the other and kiddies all over the house. He is strong for the kiddies and the kiddies are strong for him, and so are their parents, because they know that when the youngsters are at the Schuylkill they are out of mischief. The confidence of the parents is the greatest asset a man can have, and Mr. Zerr has this to a remarkable degree. That's what makes his the house for the whole family.

Play Ball.

The Sanger Amusement Company, Shreveport, La., which is about evenly divided in interest between films and pills, does not let its interest in drugs spoil its picture advertising. The cut shows their idea of the way to advertise Kalem's "Breaking Into the Big League." We wonder, by the way, how many managers had the forethought to book up that attraction about the time the Giants were wrestling with the Athletics for the big title. Anything that is different from the usual thing is good and this ball field is very different.

The House Organ.

Mr. Wilby has also started a house organ, and unlike many, he hastens to give credit to those motion picture publications from which he derives his items. The salutatory is in the same vein of frankness as the matter quoted above. Here, too, is an item that might be copied with profit:

> And we are particularly sincere in that invitation that you contribute to our columns. We want to know what you think about this publication, about our house and its management—we didn't say manager, notice—about pictures in general. We want suggestions; for in the final analysis, our success depends upon your enjoyment of our place, and surely you know more of what you enjoy than we do. Then, too, the enjoyment you gain from a visit here certainly depends upon our conducting the place as you think it should be conducted. So when you speak up we both gain.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by Epes Winthrop Sargent

Plotting and Developing.

WE cannot agree with a correspondent, a Swiss of unusually good education, who writes:

> My third suggestion is of quite another nature; it concerns the study of photoplay writing; the great difficulty in this is, to my mind, not the plot, but the correct developing of the same into scenes. Why? Because one has only for a model the plays shown on the screen. Now, for learning languages, or versification, or simple letter-writing, I can buy myself a book teaching the art and refer to it always when needed; I can even learn it by heart; but how in this fleeting vision of a play on the screen, and the rapid succession of the scenes, is one to retain anything more than a passing, confused impression? Even taking notes is an impossibility. Then comes another play, and the preceding one is as surely forgotten as a dream is effaced by another dream. If the photoplay houses would give one play for one week, there might be a chance of making a study of the technique, but they most all change their programme every day. Therefore have I thought that it might be a good idea to gather in book form some good plays and publish them under the title of Model Scenarios, just like any other compilation of poems, essays, etc., for the use of students. I know that in your second edition of the Technique of the Photoplay (which I have not got as yet) you give the reader a few samples of complete scenarios, but I do not think that it is quite enough; some people, like myself, are so dull they must have it all hammered into their heads with many, many examples of every kind and variety.

Because we have written a book on technique and because we insist that the full and proper technical development of a story into action by scenes is the only proper way to write a play, it should not be supposed that we regard form as being superior to plot. Quite to the contrary. The mere form of photoplay is no more a real play than a plaster cast is a human being with a soul, and we think that if this correspondent will first learn what a plot really is and will mentally work it over until it presents itself in actual, visible action, she will find that the play will write itself, given a knowledge of technical form and a glance at a sample play. The trouble seems to be, with others as well as her, that she seeks through the technique of construction to make good the deficiencies of actual plot. She gets her creation down on paper. It does not look right because it is not right. She blames the construction instead of the plot and seeks, through construction, to make it better.

We are closely observing the work of several writers of various stages of advancement. Two are at a stage where they are having some trouble getting their ideas down on paper. All of the rest are not yet able to evolve genuine plots.

An ability to develop a plot in proper form may be acquired by any person of intelligence and application, but the gift of plot making, which is merely another name for imagination, is largely inherent. The gift may be developed through training just as any other mental or physical attribute may be developed through exercise, but the foundation of photoplay success is imagination plus the knowledge of photoplay wants that enables the author to direct the imagination into proper channels.

The other day a well-known author declared that he would take up photoplay and with his knowledge of writing quickly gain success. That he has imagination cannot be questioned. He has grown gray at the writing game and can point to stories, to plays and to a couple of thousand columns of special work for newspapers to support his reputation, but he sat at the lunch table and reeled off perhaps a dozen plots that were absolutely unsuitable for picturing. He had the imagination and the trained brain of the thinker, but he knew nothing about plotting pictures and he was planning precisely the same plots that Jimmie Jones, who drives the grocery wagon, and Sammy Smith, whose horse is hitched to a plough, might turn out—do turn out, for that matter.

Ability to think plots does not count for much until you have trained yourself to think the right sort of plots, but when you have learned to think the right sort of plots and think them out in the right sort of way, the writing becomes merely a matter of mechanics. You must have this mechanical training, but if you have the right sort of a plot each situation will almost automatically lead to the next, if you have had sufficient practice. It is possible to arrive at a point where you have merely to think of an idea and then run it through the typewriting mill, but that facility, of course, will come only after years of work and study.

The proper study of photoplay is not the study of the sample script but the study of the plot. When plots come freely, then the mechanical side will be found simple because the dramatic side of each situation is suggested by the plot itself. An attractive woman passes on the street. A man says "What a pretty girl!" A woman says "What a stylish dress." An artist might comment on the manner in which the costuming sets off the girl's type of beauty. He considers the girl and the dress as a whole, where the less thoughtful have noted but one of the two points. It is the same way with photoplay. Learn to see both the gripping story and its dramatic possibilities. Then the actual writing will be easy.

And right on top of this comes a letter from an interesting correspondent whose three early ambitions were to marry the Prince of Wales, own a purple velvet dress with a long train and be an author. After two fiction stories that brought favorable comment, but no checks, she turned her attention to plays, having changed her mind about the dress and the Prince. She has had no technical training whatever and has seen only one sample script, but here is her record:

> The plots were old, the themes conventional, and finally I let them lie down and die. But I had letters from twelve editors, departing from precedent—or so I have been led to believe—and telling me that they wanted to see my future work. In fact, Mr. Long of the Red Book said he wanted my first story to appear in print, and that with my "beautiful writing" I had nothing to do but get good plots. And we all know that the PLOT is the thing. Then I turned my attention to photoplays. The Selig Polyscope Company took my first one, sent in about July 19th, at $50. They also took the next four. Then two came back, and since then they have taken one more; have one under consideration, waiting until Mr. Selig's return from Europe around October 15, so Mr. Pribyl said, as it presented some mechanical difficulties; and two others sent in this week, on which they have not had time to pass. Isn't that pretty good? Or is it? (It is.—Ed.) It is true that James Oliver Curwood sent me the carbon copy of one of his scripts, which gave me the mechanical construction of the scenario. But I have had no help other than that, and you and every one know, that if I didn't deliver the goods Selig would not take my plays all at the $50 price, all single reels at that, no matter how well gotten up the script was. In fact, the two scripts on the preparation of which I worked hardest, perfectly gotten up, neat as wax, were returned, one as too conventional, the other as too expensive to produce as a single reel.

What Eclair Wants.

Mrs. F. Marion Brandon, editor of the Eclair Company, states that her company is in need of strong two and three reel western and Mexican stories. She asks that authors who cannot show three produced scripts refrain from sending in and that those who do send in prepay the postage in full and supply a stamped and addressed return cover. She adds that many experienced authors are careless about payment of postage. The scripts should be sent to 225 West 42d Street and not to the Fort Lee studio, where no provision has been made to care for scripts.

Supplementing Mrs. Brandon's statement, it might be added that two reel stories must carry two full reels of action and not merely acting. Eclair has a large sale abroad and at present the foreign market is not absorbing much American made two reel stuff because so much of it is a padded one reel or reel and a half. The Eclair Company maintains a higher standard and this must be met if a sale is to be made.

Get the Addresses.

Even as late as this morning we got a letter that started: "A month ago I sent a manuscript to the Universal Company, Union Square, and it did not come back." There was a time, about a year ago, that the address was correct, but in the advertisement and on the address list the new location has been given since their removal to the Mecca Building.

Each week we advertise to send free a list of addresses of regular companies and an effort is made to keep this list strictly up to date. It may be had at no other cost than a return cover properly stamped. If you have not had one in the last three months send for one, and send for one every two or three months. Meantime watch this department for changes in addresses and mark your list accordingly. No author can sell to advantage unless he has the proper addresses and knows the company's wants.

It is probable that a letter sent the old address will be delivered to the new, but an obsolete address assuredly does not argue for up-to-date methods and so the script comes into the studio with a lovely black eye.

Something to Read.

Readers who want to get the studio atmosphere will do well to get the November issue of the Ladies' World and commence James Oppenheim's Peg O' the Movies, which starts in that number. Mr. Oppenheim has done much work for Edison and some other companies and knows the studio. Better still, he is able to transfer the atmosphere of the studio to the white paper. The first installment gives but a hint of a visit to the studio, but in the chapters to come a great amount of detail will be given. The Van Loan stories in the Saturday Evening Post have given a glimpse behind the scenes in California. This promises to do the same for the New York indoor work.

A Rose by Any Other Name.

A new company is advertising the old National Author's Institute Course and seems to have come into possession of the books and papers of the old concern.

Were You Elected.

Were you among those "selected" by the head of one of the correspondence schools to receive a "free" scholarship? A "free" scholarship means that you pay only $15, instead of $30; a dollar down and two dollars per lesson. If you got one of the circulars we hope you enjoyed it as much as we did ours.

"These are the harvest days," the professor writes and calls attention to the entrance into the field of Klaw and Erlanger, the Shuberts, the Lieblers and others in proof of the statement, thoughtfully forgetting to add that these theatrical speculators will not be buying scripts as their scheme is merely to procure the picturing of their stage successes. Another paragraph reads:

> It is our firm belief that before the year is well advanced (and this in September, mind you!) the average price for good scenarios will be $50 each. Three years ago $5 each was the average price, now it is $25.

If the writer of the circular knows anything about the business he is supposed to teach, he knows perfectly well that three years ago the average price for scripts was not five dollars each any more than $25 is now the "average" price.

The post office inspectors will get him if he isn't careful. We hope they do.

And, just by the way of contrast, here is a paragraph from a letter written by a graduate of that same school, who mentions the $15 as payment without any "free" scholarship:

> I never told you before that I had been a victim of a correspondence school. The Schools (?) for the training of playwrights(!)—because I was ashamed to admit myself a "come on." Lured by their glowing advertisements, I began the "course." When each lesson arrived I was disappointed, because I already practically knew all it contained, but hoped each time that the next one would disclose the magic secret which would transform me into a photoplaywright. Fifteen good dollars did I "shell out" for the course, and the only thing it taught me was how much of a fool I had been.

Talbot's Titles.

Steve Talbot has been tabulating titles and he claims these as his own:

The Smuggler's, Sheriff's, Prospector's, Outlaw's or Tenderfoot's Daughter, Baby, Bride, Child, Partner or Chum.

The Redskin's, Indian's or Half-breed's Revenge, Remorse, Loyalty, Treachery, Courage or Gratitude.

The Detective's, Gambler's, Husband's or Bandit's Ruse, Mistake, Trick, Predicament, Honor or Oath.

The Burglar's, Outcast's, Convict's or Thief's Conscience, Vengeance, Redemption, Atonement, Nemesis, Infamy, Heart, Fate or Gratitude.

The, His or Her Last Shot.

The Old Song, Melody, Actor, Bookkeeper or Clerk.

For the Honor, Love, Spirit or Sake of the Flag, Cause, South, Tribe or Regiment.

A Mother's, Cowboy's, Sister's or Brother's Strategy, Sacrifice, Peril, Secret, Sorrow, Faith, Influence, Ambition, Lesson, Triumph, Picture, Reward or Love.

A Woman's or Wife's Scorn, Jealousy, Love, Hatred, Anguish, Greed, Destiny, Secret, Pride, Power, Struggle, Deception, Way, Influence, Choice, Sin or Honor.

Retribution, Retrogression, Redemption and Regeneration.

Personally we are entirely willing to let him have all these, but where would the business be with these titles (some of which have been used four or five times in the past two years) kept out of circulation?

There is a laugh in this list, but also there lies a lesson, and the moral is, do not use bromidic titles.

The Aftermath.

About seventeen persons, or perhaps a couple more, have been splitting hairs over that two-reel Lubin script recently published in this department. One reader wants to know the meaning of "acquiescent atmosphere" used in scene three and what "Register that train has started" means. Speaks Lawrence S. McCloskey, the author-editor. Originally the script was not written to be used as a model. The director for whom it was written had a great habit of applying the word "acquiescent" to anything he considered "right." With him it was synonymous with proper, agreeable, apropos, fitting, etc., so that in the script instead of saying "handsomely appointed" or "air of wealth" or "elaborately furnished," the phrase was used merely to remind him that, as Fielding & Son were very wealthy and catered to high class patrons, the atmosphere of the store should be in keeping with the character of the firm.

"Register that train has started." To the actors and stage directors, "register" is another and most convenient substitute for "get over," "make plain," or "convey to the audience." When writing the script I did not know just how the director would find it convenient to set the camera in the Pullman car scene. If a view through the windows could be obtained, the train's starting could be registered by moving scenery; if not, then the departure could be registered by a few passengers waving good-byes to imaginary friends outside.

Adds Mr. McCloskey:

"If [illegible] Marimee [illegible] other slang phrases written in the script, you can tell them I'm an uncouth lowbrow who when writing in a hurry, for brevity's sake, makes use of the expressions that occur to me most readily."

The use of convenient slang is common in the studios, but it should not be used by the outsider. If we write for a director who is a friend we might say "Lamps Lizzie—peach—trails her" instead of "Fred sees Lizzie—registers that she has won his heart—follows her out of the scene," but if the aforesaid director friend should decline to make the aforesaid script we would translate it into regular English before sending it elsewhere. The sample script was not offered as a model of English. It was offered as a study of the scene construction and plot elaboration of a two-reel script. Consider it as such and do not put each individual phrase under the microscope, or you shall have no more to read. William Lord Wright says he is opposed to sample scripts on the grounds that young authors make their succeeding scripts slavish imitations. He is not altogether right, but there is a lot to what he says. Too many regard the form rather than the substance.

Mr. McCloskey uses excellent English when he wants to, but like all who write a great deal he finds a relief in dropping into slang occasionally—but on the proper occasion.

Inquiries.

NOTE—No questions can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. A list of addresses to which photoplays may be sent will be mailed on receipt of a STAMPED AND ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of a script.

W. H. J.—To use a story, whether copyrighted or not, is not permissible. You are required to sign a release form to the effect that the story is your own. The subsequent discovery that the story is not your own may be followed by the most unpleasant consequences.

B. M.—Mr. Brennan, now of Kalem, is the "Way Down East" comedian. As Mr. Kerrigan is out West and Miss Lawrence is working in New York, it is not likely that they will appear together in Victor films.

MRS. W. A. M.—Write the Universal asking if they have seen the script and send us a stamped and addressed envelope for a list of proper addresses. The Universal moved more than a year ago and Mr. Kennedy is not the Western manager. Outside of these small details you were all right. If the Universal cannot locate the script notify them formally that it is withdrawn and that you shall hold them responsible for any use made of it, then copy your carbon and send the ribbon copy elsewhere. No use to send it to Eastern Universal, as they buy so very little outside stuff.

BETTY BELL.—William Stowell was Tom, the favorite grandson in "Granny's Old Arm Chair."

F. B. S.—The Champion brand was merged into the Universal combination and the use of that designation dropped. Ask the local manager to try and locate that release through his exchange. The reel should still be in commission.

F. K.—Thanhouser no longer casts its players. Miss Anna Nilsson played both parts in "The Counterfeiter's Confederate." You can build up a slight plot into a strong story if you know the trick and have the imagination. See the chapter on "Putting in the Punch" in Technique of the Photoplay.

F. M.—Miss Adrienne Kroell was Mrs. Wynn and T. J. Carrigan Wynn in Selig's "Wheels of Fate," not "Wheels of Destiny." There are three "Wheels of Fate" and two "Wheels of Destiny," by the way. Miss Alma Russell was Nell. Mr. Carrigan is also "The Man in the Street" in that series.

J. D.—To the argument of the gentleman who declares that "The Trust" will not permit the circulation of other than its own pictures, merely point to the weekly releases of the Universal, Mutual and Exclusive. If that does not convince him add the state rights features. If that fails then give it up, but the weekly appearance of about fifty thousand feet of unlicensed film should convince anyone.

M. E. H.—We have not that Bronco cast. See reply to B. M.

F. F.—It is not uncommon to see licensed and independent films on the same program these days. George Field was Leon in "A Dead Man's Shoes." Your last question is rather obscure. Do you mean Miss Paulina Bush, who went over to the Universal?

RUBEENA.—And only one letter again this week! That scheme surely is a fake. We have seen their printed matter. It is announced that Mr. Foote is going to rest up for a time. King Baggot is not going to play opposite Miss Lawrence.

S. H. F.—Titles may not be copyrighted. The protection applies to the text and not to the title. Common law will protect a title if it can be shown that the second use of the same title is an attempt to trade upon the popularity of the first. See reply to F. M. above.

C. I. C.—We do not place the lady.

A. P.—Your question was replied to in due course. You are rather young to be able to write acceptable plays, but it will do you no harm to start studying against the time when you will be able to devise suitable plots. Send to the Lubin company for one of their form sheets, which will be sent free if you will enclose a stamped and addressed envelope. Then follow the suggestions and write. You'll have to write for a couple of years for practice alone, but if you will carefully study the stories you see on the screen, when you do attain the dignity of long dresses you'll have that much start. Do not waste money on books or schools or postage just now. They cannot help you much at present. This department is for all readers of the paper and not for any club.

E. M. W.—Thelma Thompson was the girl in "Heart Throbs." Miss Gertrude Bambrick was the town's leading lady in "A Horse on Bill." You have nothing to do with casting the plays. You write the play and make a list of characters and the studio will cast the roles.

J. L.—If you write better plays than you see on the screen and short-sighted editors won't buy them, it might be well for you to stop and try something else.

M. D.—We could answer your questions just as intelligently if you omitted the raves about the handsome players. Fred Church was the lead in "The Broken Parole." Miss Eleanor Blevins was Nita. Your third question seems to refer to Miss Edna Payne. We do not know where she is at present. Consult the Edison company about the last question if you have the nerve. The Answers Man cannot [illegible].

B. S.—It is not necessary to go as extensively into your scripts as you suggest. You do not designate right from left. The script shown was a studio-made script and more full in detail than usual. You are welcome to all the answers you want. That's what the department is for.

C. G. B.—You are not playing the game in the right spirit and you never will win until you do. As to your second letter, the company you mention is in the habit of paying promptly. Possibly a lost letter has caused them to wait.

Projection Department

Question No. 3.

WHAT is the essential difference, both mechanically and electrically, in a shunt-wound and a compound wound dynamo, and which is the best for use in an isolated plant supplying current for house lighting and projection, and why is it the best? (I guess this will hold you for a minute.)

The best reply will be published and other replies of excellence will be mentioned in the Roll of Honor.

Some Very Interesting Data.

Mr. Martin in his paper deals with the performance of projection arcs as follows:

> Figure 5 shows the relative candle-power of the arc on a. c. and d. c., at varying current densities. Readings were made in a horizontal plane, the size of carbons, alignment and arc gap were adjusted in each case to give the steadiest performance. Attention is called to the termination of the curves for the right angle and flaming arc at about 27 amperes, beyond which point the magnetic blowout effect in this method of aligning the electrodes has such high value that the arc is lengthened, becomes very unsteady and consequently unsatisfactory. For the same current density, all forms of the arc have a much greater intensity on direct current than on alternating current. This condition is due to the pronounced crater of the direct current arc and the ease with which the flux of light from this crater may be directed by the alignment of the electrodes.

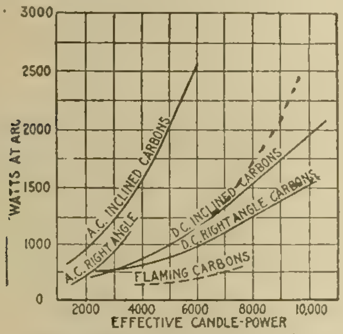

Fig. 5.—Performance of Projection Arc.

As in the former case a study of the diagram is of much interest to operators, as is also the text matter. I take it that the test was made with the arc so adjusted as to give the maximum screen illumination at all times. It will be observed that, according to this diagram, both the a. c. and d. c. curves are almost straight. Or, in other words, any increase in wattage up to the point shown, creates exactly the same relative increase in candle-power at any point between 500 and 2,500 watts.

I am inclined to doubt the correctness of the conclusion drawn from, and by this chart. It is a well-known and generally recognized fact that the lens system will absorb, or utilize a greater percentage of the light from a small light source than from a large one. If this holds good, there should be a greater dropping off in the rise of effective candle-power as the wattage mounts, this by reason of the fact that the crater is constantly becoming larger, hence the lens is unable to utilize as great a percentage of the light as it would with the smaller wattage and a smaller crater. This, too, ought to hold true in a greater degree with d. c. than with a. c. and I note that to some extent it does, though, in order to make this line of reasoning hold good the d. c. line should follow somewhat the course of the dotted line. (Dotted line was added to the diagram by myself—Ed.) Apparently, Mr. Martin's light value reading is not taken after the light has passed through the lens system, but is taken directly from the arc. But if this is true, then the diagram has little or no value to the moving picture operator, since it does not show the actual effective light available at the screen. Mr. Martin's remarks concerning the relative light intensity of a. c. and d. c. are merely the reiteration of well-known and established facts. A diagram showing the light curve of a projector arc at different current intensities, the reading being taken after the light has passed the lens system, would be of immense value. If Mr. Martin knows of such a diagram, or could prepare one, or if anyone else can do so, we shall indeed be glad to have it.

High Amperage.

St. Paul, Minnesota, contributes the following:

> I hope I am not intruding, but I noticed, September 13th issue, page 1174, your remarks on large carbons. There is, as you say, a tendency to use larger carbons, but I think that out of every ten operators only three are using the right amperage. We have in this city a carbon combination which is hard to beat where from 50 to 70 amperes d. c. are used; it is ¾ top and 9/16 bottom. The lower carbon may be either cored or solid. I, however, prefer the cored since it gives me better control of the arc. I hold that ⅝ cored or solid is not a proper combination with a ¾ upper. Mr. Charles Bell, of this city, was the first to use the 9/16 and ¾ combination, and to him the credit is due. I believe in having lower carbons with long points, say about 2 inches. What do you think of this? I use 64 amperes d. c. and have a 1912 motiograph, which is doing fine work. The machine has a six blade shutter which cuts lots of light, yet I get a brilliant picture.
